PREFACE

On Wednesday, October 17, 1979, President Carter signed into law the Department of Education Organization Act (Public Law 96–88), thereby ending with the stroke of a pen the long, 120-year quest of educators, parents, students, and citizens to give education high visibility, attention, and status at the national level.

The Department of Education thus becomes our 13th Cabinet department. But of those 13 agencies, none has been more thoroughly debated than the Education Department. Its long legislative history includes thousands of pages of congressional testimony, reports, and floor debate. Even a light reading of these historical documents would show how Congress closely scrutinized and debated the bills' provisions and issues.

Robert Heffernan and Marilyn Harris of the committee staff provided assistance in the preparation of this compilation.

The printing of this "Legislative History" of the Department of Education should help researchers and the public to understand the many issues debated, and to appreciate the extent and thoroughness of congressional deliberations on the subject.

Chairman,

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress finds that— 20 USC 3401.

(1) education is fundamental to the development of individual citizens and the progress of the Nation;

(2) there is a continuing need to ensure equal access for all Americans to educational opportunities of a high quality, and such educational opportunities should not be denied because of race, creed, color, national origin, or sex;

(3) parents have the primary responsibility for the education of their children, and States, localities, and private institutions have the primary responsibility for supporting that parental role;

(4) in our Federal system, the primary public responsibility for education is reserved respectively to the States and the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States;

(5) the American people benefit from a diversity of educational settings, including public and private schools, libraries, museums and other institutions, the workplace, the community, and the home;

(6) the importance of education is increasing as new technologies and alternative approaches to traditional education are considered, as society becomes more complex, and as equal opportunities in education and employment are promoted;

(7) there is a need for improvement in the management and coordination of Federal education programs to support more effectively State, local, and private institutions, students, and parents in carrying out their educational responsibilities;

(8) the dispersion of education programs across a large number of Federal agencies has led to fragmented, duplicative, and often inconsistent Federal policies relating to education;

(9) Presidential and public consideration of issues relating to Federal education programs is hindered by the present organizational position of education programs in the executive branch of the Government; and

(10) there is no single, full-time, Federal education official directly accountable to the President, the Congress, and the people.

PURPOSES

20 USC 3402. SEC. 102. The Congress declares that the establishment of a Department of Education is in the public interest, will promote the general welfare of the United States, will help ensure that education issues receive proper treatment at the Federal level, and will enable the Federal Government to coordinate its education activities more effectively. Therefore, the purposes of this Act are—

(1) to strengthen the Federal commitment to ensuring access to equal educational opportunity for every individual;

(2) to supplement and complement the efforts of States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, the private sector, public and private educational institutions, public and private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents, and students to improve the quality of education;

(3) to encourage the increased involvement of the public, parents, and students in Federal education programs;

(4) to promote improvements in the quality and usefulness of education through federally supported research, evaluation, and sharing of information;

(5) to improve the coordination of Federal education programs;

(6) to improve the management and efficiency of Federal education activities, especially with respect to the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, as well as the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens and constraints, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds; and

(7) to increase the accountability of Federal education programs to the President, the Congress, and the public.

FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONSHIPS

20 USC 3403. SEC. 103. (a) It is the intention of the Congress in the establishment of the Department to protect the rights of State and local governments and public and private educational institutions in the areas of educational policies and administration of programs and to strengthen and improve the control of such governments and institutions over their own educational programs and policies. The establishment of the Department of Education shall not increase the authority of the Federal Government over education or diminish the responsibility for education which is reserved to the States and the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States.

(b) No provision of a program administered by the Secretary or by any other officer of the Department shall be construed to authorize the Secretary or any such officer to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of any educational institution, school, or school system, over any accrediting agency or association, or over the selection or content of library resources, textbooks, or other instructional materials by any educational institution or school system, except to the extent authorized by law.

(c) The Secretary shall not, during the period within eight months after the effective date of this Act, take any action to withhold, suspend, or terminate funds under any program transferred by this Act by reason of the failure of any State to comply with any applicable law requiring the administration of such a program through a single organizational unit.

DEFINITIONS

20 USC 3404.

SEC. 104. As used in this Act, unless otherwise provided or indicated by the context—

(1) the term "Department" means the Department of Education or any component thereof;

(2) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education;

(3) the term "Under Secretary" means the Under Secretary of Education;

(4) the term "function" includes any duty, obligation, power, authority, responsibility, right, privilege, activity, or program;

(5) the term "State" includes the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands;

(6) the terms "private" and "private educational" refer to independent, nonpublic, and private institutions of elementary, secondary, and postsecondary education; and

(7) the term "office" includes any office, institute, council, unit, organizational entity, or component thereof.

TITLE II—ESTABLISHMENT OF THE DEPARTMENT

20 USC 3411.

SEC. 201. There is established an executive department to be known as the Department of Education. The Department shall be administered, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, under the supervision and direction of a Secretary of Education. The Secretary shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Secretary of Education, appointment and confirmation.

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS

Under Secretary, appointment and confirmation.
20 USC 3412.

SEC. 202. (a)(1) There shall be in the Department an Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Secretary shall designate the order in which other officials of the Department shall act for and perform the functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of both the Secretary and Under Secretary or in the event of vacancies in both of those offices.

(2)(A) The Under Secretary shall have responsibility for the conduct of intergovernmental relations of the Department, including assuring (i) that the Department carries out its functions in a manner which supplements and complements the education policies, programs, and procedures of the States and the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, and (ii) that appropriate officials of the Department consult with individuals responsible for making policy relating to education in the States and the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States concerning differences over education policies, programs, and procedures and concerning the impact of the rules and regulations of the Department on the States and the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States.

(B) Local education authorities may inform the Under Secretary of any rules or regulations of the Department which are in conflict with another rule or regulation issued by any other Federal department or agency or with any other office of the Department. If the Under Secretary determines, after consultation with the appropriate Federal department or agency, that such a conflict does exist, the Under Secretary shall report such conflict or conflicts to the appropriate Federal department or agency together with recommendations for the correction of the conflict.

(b)(1) There shall be in the Department—

(A) an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education;

(B) an Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education;

(C) an Assistant Secretary for Vocational and Adult Education;

(D) an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services;

(E) an Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement;

(F) an Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights; and

(G) a General Counsel.

Assistant Secretaries and General Counsel, appointment and confirmation.

(2) Each of the Assistant Secretaries and the General Counsel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Inspector General, appointment.
92 Stat. 1101.
Post, p. 692.

(c) There shall be in the Department an Inspector General appointed in accordance with the Inspector General Act of 1978 (as amended by section 508(n) of this Act).

Additional officers, appointment and confirmation.
Functions.

(d) There shall be in the Department four additional officers who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The officers appointed under this subsection shall perform such functions as the Secretary shall prescribe, including—

(1) congressional relations functions;

(2) public information functions, including the provision, through the use of the latest technologies, of useful information about education and related opportunities to students, parents, and communities;

(3) functions related to monitoring parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required by law, and encouraging the involvement of parents, students, and the public in the development and implementation of departmental programs;

(4) management and budget functions;

(5) planning, evaluation, and policy development functions, including development of policies to promote the efficient and coordinated administration of the Department and its programs and to encourage improvements in education; and

(6) functions related to encouraging and promoting the study of foreign languages and the study of cultures of other countries at the elementary, secondary, and postsecondary levels.

(e) There shall be in the Department an Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents.

(f) Whenever the President submits the name of an individual to the Senate for confirmation as an officer of the Department under this section, the President shall state the particular functions of the Department such individual will exercise upon taking office.

(g) Each officer of the Department established under this section shall report directly to the Secretary and shall, in addition to any functions vested in or required to be delegated to such officer, perform such additional functions as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS

20 USC 3413.

SEC. 203. (a) There shall be in the Department an Office for Civil Rights, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights appointed under section 202(b). Notwithstanding the provisions of section 412 of this Act, the Secretary shall delegate to the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights all functions, other than administrative and support functions, transferred to the Secretary under section 301(a)(3).

Report to Secretary, President, and Congress.

(b)(1) The Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights shall make an annual report to the Secretary, the President, and the Congress summarizing the compliance and enforcement activities of the Office for Civil Rights and identifying significant civil rights or compliance problems as to which such Office has made a recommendation for corrective action and as to which, in the judgment of the Assistant Secretary, adequate progress is not being made.

(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the report required by paragraph (1) shall be transmitted to the Secretary, the President, and the Congress by the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights without further clearance or approval. The Assistant Secretary shall provide copies of the report required by paragraph (1) to the Secretary sufficiently in advance of its submission to the President and the Congress to provide a reasonable opportunity for comments of the Secretary to be appended to the report.

(c) In addition to the authority otherwise provided under this section, the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights, in carrying out the provisions of this section, is authorized—

(1) to collect or coordinate the collection of data necessary to ensure compliance with civil rights laws within the jurisdiction of the Office for Civil Rights;

(2) to select, appoint, and employ such officers and employees, including staff attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of such Office, subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service and the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates;

5 USC 5331.

(3) to enter into contracts and other arrangements for audits, studies, analyses, and other services with public agencies and with private organizations and persons, and to make such payments as may be necessary to carry out the compliance and enforcement functions of such Office; and

(4) notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, to obtain services as authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, at a rate not to exceed the equivalent daily rate payable for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title.

3 CFR 1978 Comp., p. 236.

OFFICE OF ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

20 USC 3414. SEC. 204. There shall be in the Department an Office of Elementary and Secondary Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education appointed under section 202(b). The Assistant Secretary shall administer such functions affecting elementary and secondary education, both public and private, as the Secretary shall delegate.

OFFICE OF POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION

20 USC 3415. SEC. 205. There shall be in the Department an Office of Postsecondary Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education appointed under section 202(b). The Assistant Secretary shall administer such functions affecting postsecondary education, both public and private, as the Secretary shall delegate, and shall serve as the principal adviser to the Secretary on matters affecting public and private postsecondary education.

OFFICE OF VOCATIONAL AND ADULT EDUCATION

20 USC 3416. SEC. 206. There shall be in the Department an Office of Vocational and Adult Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Vocational and Adult Education appointed under section 202(b). The Assistant Secretary shall administer such functions affecting vocational and adult education as the Secretary shall delegate, and shall serve as principal adviser to the Secretary on matters affecting vocational and adult education. The Secretary, through the Assistant Secretary, shall also provide a unified approach to rural education and rural family education through the coordination of programs within the Department and shall work with the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to coordinate related activities and programs of other Federal departments and agencies.

OFFICE OF SPECIAL EDUCATION AND REHABILITATIVE SERVICES

20 USC 3417. SEC. 207. There shall be in the Department an Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services appointed under section 202(b). Notwithstanding the provisions of section 412, the Secretary shall delegate to the Assistant Secretary all functions, other than administrative and support functions, transferred to the Secretary under sections 301(a)(1) (with respect to the bureau for the education and training of the handicapped), 301(a)(2)(H), and 301(a)(4).

OFFICE OF EDUCATION FOR OVERSEAS DEPENDENTS

20 USC 3418. SEC. 208. There shall be in the Department an Office of Education for Overseas Dependents, to be administered by the Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents appointed under section 202(e). Notwithstanding the provisions of section 412, the Secretary shall delegate to the Administrator all functions, other than administrative and support functions, transferred to the Secretary under section 302.

OFFICE OF EDUCATIONAL RESEARCH AND IMPROVEMENT

20 USC 3419. SEC. 209. There shall be in the Department an Office of Educational Research and Improvement, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement appointed under section 202(b). The Assistant Secretary shall administer such functions concerning research, development, demonstration, dissemination, evaluation, and assessment activities as the Secretary shall delegate.

OFFICE OF BILINGUAL EDUCATION AND MINORITY LANGUAGES AFFAIRS

Sec. 210. There shall be in the Department an Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs, to be administered by a Director of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs, who shall be appointed by the Secretary. The Director shall coordinate the administration of bilingual education programs by the Department and shall consult with the Secretary concerning policy decisions affecting bilingual education and minority languages affairs. The Director shall report directly to the Secretary, and shall perform such additional functions as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL

Sec. 211. There shall be in the Department an Office of General Counsel, to be administered by the General Counsel appointed under section 202(b). The General Counsel shall provide legal assistance to the Secretary concerning the programs and policies of the Department.

20 USC 3421.

OFFICE OF INSPECTOR GENERAL

Sec. 212. There shall be in the Department an Office of Inspector General, established in accordance with the Inspector General Act of 1978 (as amended by section 508(n) of this Act).

20 USC 3422.

92 Stat. 1101.
Post, p. 692.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

Sec. 213. (a) There shall be in the Department an advisory committee to be known as the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education (hereafter referred in this section as the "Council"). The Council shall provide assistance and make recommendations to the Secretary and the President concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education.

(b)(1) In carrying out its functions under subsection (a), the Council shall—

Functions.

(A) provide a forum for representatives of Federal, State, and local governments and public and private educational entities to discuss educational issues;

(B) make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education and education related programs;

(C) promote better intergovernmental relations;

(D) submit, biennially or more frequently (if determined necessary by the Council), a report to the Secretary, the President, and the Congress (i) reviewing the impact of Federal education activities upon State and local governments and public and private educational institutions, including an assessment of compliance with section 103 of this Act and of any change in the Federal role in education, and (ii) assessing both the extent to which Federal objectives are achieved and any adverse consequences of Federal actions.

Report to Secretary, President, and Congress.

(2) In carrying out its functions under subsection (a), the Council may review existing and proposed rules or regulations of the Department concerning Federal education programs in order to determine the impact or potential impact of such rules or regulations on State and local governments and public and private educational institutions. The Council may submit to the Secretary a report containing the results of its review of any existing or proposed rule or regulation. If a report by the Council concerns a proposed rule or regulation, it shall be submitted to the Secretary within the time established for public comment on the proposed rule or regulation, and shall be placed in the file of the proceeding concerning the proposed rule or regulation. Report.

Members. (c)(1) The Council shall be composed of twenty members, appointed by the President as follows:

(A) six elected State and local officials with general government responsibilities;

(B) five representatives of public and private elementary and secondary education, from among board members, chief education officials, administrators, and teachers;

(C) five representatives of public and private postsecondary education, from among board members, chief education officials, administrators, and professors; and

(D) four members of the public, including parents of students and students.

(2) In making appointments under this subsection, the President shall—

(A) consult with representatives of the groups specified in subparagraphs (A) through (D) of paragraph (1); and

(B) select individuals who represent a diversity of geographic areas and demographic characteristics.

(3) The Under Secretary shall be an ex officio member of the Council.

Terms of office. (4) The term of office of a member of the Council shall be four years, except that—

(A) no member serving pursuant to paragraph (1)(A) of this subsection may serve on the Council beyond the period that such member holds an office qualifying such member for appointment under such paragraph; and

(B) the President shall divide the initial appointments to the Council into four groups of five members each for initial terms of one, two, three, and four years.

(5) The President shall designate one member to chair the Council.

(6) Any vacancy in the Council shall not affect its authority.

(d) The Council shall nominate and the Secretary shall appoint an executive director for the Council. The Secretary shall provide the Council with such other staff, facilities, services, and support as may be necessary to enable the Council to carry out its duties under this section.

FEDERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

20 USC 3424. SEC. 214. (a) There is established a Federal Interagency Committee on Education (hereafter referred to in this section as the "Committee"). The Committee shall assist the Secretary in providing a mechanism to assure that the procedures and actions of the Department and other Federal departments and agencies are fully coordinated.

(b) The Committee shall study and make recommendations for assuring effective coordination of Federal programs, policies, and administrative practices affecting education, including—

(1) consistent administration and development of policies and practices among Federal agencies in the conduct of related programs;

(2) full and effective communication among Federal agencies to avoid unnecessary duplication of activities and repetitive collection of data;

(3) full and effective cooperation with the Secretary on such studies and analyses as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act;

(4) coordination of related programs to assure that recipients of Federal assistance are efficiently and responsively served; and

(5) full and effective involvement and participation of students and parents in Federal education programs.

Members.

(c) The Committee shall be composed of the Secretary, who shall chair the Committee, and senior policy making officials from those Federal agencies, commissions, and boards that the President may find appropriate.

(d) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, and the Executive Director of the Domestic Policy Staff may each designate a staff member to attend meetings of the Committee.

Study.

(e) The Committee shall conduct a study concerning the progress, effectiveness, and accomplishments of Federal vocational education and training programs, and the need for improved coordination between all federally funded vocational education and training programs. The Committee shall report the findings of such study to the Secretary and the Congress within two years of the date of enactment of this Act.

Report to Secretary and Congress.

(f) The Committee shall meet at least twice each year. The Secretary may establish subcommittees of the Committee to facilitate coordination in important areas of Federal activity.

(g) The Secretary and the head of each agency represented on the Committee under subsection (c) shall furnish necessary assistance to the Committee.

TITLE III—TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

20 USC 3441.

(1) all functions of the Assistant Secretary for Education and of the Commissioner of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and all functions of the Office of such Assistant Secretary and of the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and of any officer or component of such Office or Division;

(7) any advisory committee of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare giving advice or making recommendations that primarily concern education functions transferred by this section.

(c) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Assistant Secretary for Education, or the Commissioner of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, as the case may be, with respect to—

(1) the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(2) the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education, including the National Center for Education Statistics; and

(3) any advisory committee in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare giving advice and making recommendations principally concerning education functions transferred by this section.

(d) Nothing in the provisions of this section or in the provisions of this Act shall authorize the transfer of functions under part A of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, relating to Project Head Start, from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to the Secretary. 42 USC 2928.

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

SEC. 302. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 601 of this Act, at such time not later than three years after the effective date of this Act, and in such manner, as the President may designate, there shall be transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Secretary of Defense and of the Department of Defense (or any officer or component thereof) relating to the operation of overseas schools for dependents of the Department of Defense and all functions of the Secretary of Defense and of the Department of Defense (or any officer or component thereof) under the Defense Dependents' Education Act of 1978. There shall be transferred to the Department the offices established by such Act. 20 USC 3442. 92 Stat. 2365. 20 USC 921.

(b) In addition to any other authority available to the Secretary under this or any other Act, the authority of the Secretary of Defense and the Secretaries of the military departments under the Defense Department Overseas Teachers Pay and Personnel Practices Act shall be available to the Secretary with respect to the functions transferred under subsection (a). 20 USC 901 note.

Transfer of functions plan, transmittal to Congress.

(c) Not later than one year after the effective date of this Act, the Secretary, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, shall transmit to the Congress a plan for effecting the transfer of functions under this section and administering those functions. In designing the plan, the Secretary shall also consult with representatives of organizations of parents of students enrolled in overseas dependents' schools and representatives of professional employee organizations and administrators of such schools. The plan shall contain recommendations for increasing the participation of parents, teachers, students, school administrators, and members of the Armed Forces in the administration and operation of the schools transferred under this section.

(d) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to give the Secretary authority to operate overseas institutions of higher education.

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Migrant education.
20 USC 3443.

SEC. 303. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 601 of this Act, there shall be transferred to the Secretary, at such time on or after the effective date of this Act as the Secretary certifies that there has been established in the Department a single component responsible for the administration and the coordination of programs relating to the education of migrants, all functions of the Secretary of Labor or the Department of Labor under section 303(c)(2) of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act.

29 USC 873.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to conduct the functions transferred by subsection (a).

TRANSFERS OF PROGRAMS FROM THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Science education.

42 USC 1861 note.

SEC. 304. (a)(1) There are transferred to the Secretary all programs relating to science education of the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation established prior to the effective date of this Act pursuant to the National Science Foundation Act of 1950, except the programs or parts of programs, as determined after review by the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy and the Director of the National Science Foundation, which relate to—

(A) scientific career development;

(B) the continuing education of scientific personnel;

(C) increasing the participation of women, minorities, and the handicapped in careers in science;

(D) the conduct of basic and applied research and development applied to science learning at all educational levels and the dissemination of results concerning such research and development; and

(E) informing the general public of the nature of science and technology and of attendant values and public policy issues.

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (1), no mission oriented research functions or programs of the National Science Foundation or any other Federal agency shall be transferred by this Act.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to conduct the programs transferred by subsection (a). In conducting such programs the Secretary shall consult, as appropriate, with the Director of the National Science Foundation, and shall establish advisory mechanisms designed to assure that scientists and engineers are fully involved in the development, implementation, and review of science education programs.

Report.

(c) The annual report to be transmitted by the Secretary pursuant to section 426 shall include a description of arrangements, developed by the Secretary in consultation with the Director of the National Science Foundation, for coordinated planning and operation of science education programs, including measures to facilitate the implementations of successful innovations.

(d) Nothing in this section is intended to repeal or limit the authority of the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation to initiate and conduct programs under the National Science Foundation Act of 1950.

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Law enforcement education.
20 USC 3445.

SEC. 305. There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Attorney General and of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration with regard to the student loan and grant programs known as the law enforcement education program and the law enforcement intern program authorized by subsections (b), (c), and (f) of section 406 of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968.

42 USC 3746.

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

College housing loans.
12 USC 1749.

SEC. 306. There are transferred to the Secretary all functions relating to college housing loans of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and of the Department of Housing and Urban Development under title IV of the Housing Act of 1950.

EFFECT OF TRANSFERS

20 USC 3447.

SEC. 307. The transfer of a function or office from an officer or agency to the Secretary or to the Department includes any aspects of such function or office vested in a subordinate of such officer or in a component of such agency.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

PART A—PERSONNEL PROVISIONS

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

20 USC 3461.

SEC. 401. (a) The Secretary is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, including attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Secretary and the Department. Except as otherwise provided by law, such officers and employees shall be appointed in accordance with the civil service laws and their compensation fixed in accordance with title 5 of the United States Code.

3 CFR 1978 Comp., p. 236.

(b)(1) At the request of the Secretary, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall, under section 5108 of title 5, United States Code, provide for the establishment in each of the grade levels GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18 of a number of positions in the Department equal to the number of positions in that grade level which were used primarily for the performance of functions and offices transferred under this Act and which were assigned and filled on the day before the effective date of this Act.

(2) At the request of the Secretary, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall, under section 3104 of title 5, United States Code, provide for the establishment in the Office created by section 209 of this Act of a number of scientific, professional, and technical positions outside of the General Schedule equal to the number of such positions which were used primarily for the performance of functions and offices transferred under this Act and which were assigned and filled on the day before the effective date of this Act.

(3) Appointments to positions provided for under this subsection may be made without regard to the provisions of section 3324 of title 5 of the United States Code, if the individual appointed in such position is an individual who is transferred in connection with the transfer of functions and offices under this Act and, on the day preceding the effective date of this Act, holds a position and has duties comparable to those of the position to which appointed hereunder.

Termination.

(4) The authority under this subsection with respect to any position shall terminate when the person first appointed to fill such position ceases to hold such position.

92 Stat. 1177.

(5) For purposes of section 414(a)(3)(A) of the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978, an individual appointed under this subsection shall be deemed to occupy the same position as the individual occupied on the day preceding the effective date of this Act.

3 CFR 1978 Comp., p. 236.

(c) The Secretary may appoint, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointment in the competitive service, up to 175 scientific, technical, or professional employees of the Office created by section 209 of this Act and may compensate employees so appointed without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates. The rate of basic compensation for such employees shall not be equal to or in excess of the minimum rate of pay currently paid for GS-16 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title.

Limited-term appointees.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall establish positions within the Senior Executive Service for 15 limited-term appointees. The Secretary shall appoint individuals to such positions as provided by section 3394 of title 5, United States Code. Such positions shall expire on the later of three years after the effective date of this Act or three years after the initial appointment to each position. Positions in effect under this subsection shall be taken into account in applying the limitations on positions prescribed under section 3134(e) and section 5108 of such title.

Indian preference law application.

(e) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the application of any Indian preference law in effect on the day before the date of enactment of this Act to any function or office transferred by this Act and subject to any such law on the day before the date of enactment of this Act. Any function or office transferred by this Act and subject to any such law shall continue to be subject to any such law.

"Civilian component."

(f) For purposes of any status of forces agreement between the United States and any other country or any international organization, any reference to "civilian component" shall be deemed to include a reference to overseas personnel of the overseas dependents' education system.

EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS

3 CFR 1978 Comp., p. 236.

SEC. 402. The Secretary may as provided in appropriation Acts obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, and may compensate such experts and consultants at rates not to exceed the daily rate prescribed for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title.

PERSONNEL REDUCTION AND ANNUAL LIMITATIONS

20 USC 3463.

SEC. 403. (a)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, there shall be included in each appropriation Act containing appropriations for the administration of the Department for any fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1981 (other than an appropriation Act containing only supplemental appropriations for the Department), an annual limitation on the total number of work-years for the personnel of the Department.

Reports to Congress.

(2) The Secretary shall prescribe the allocation of the work-years available under paragraph (1) among the organizational units and components of the Department and shall, within 120 days after the enactment of an appropriation Act containing a work-year limitation, prepare and transmit to the Congress a report on such allocation. Such report shall include explanations and justifications for the allocations made by the Secretary and shall indicate the necessary personnel actions which will be required as a consequence of such allocation. Not later than 120 days after the conclusion of any fiscal year to which a work-year limitation established under paragraph (1) applies, the Secretary shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a report on compliance with such limitation indicating the total work-years actually expended by the Department and by the organizational units and components to which such work-years were allocated.

5 USC 901 et seq.

(3) If the President transmits any reorganization plan under chapter 9 of title 5, United States Code, which would result in the transfer of functions or offices to the Secretary or the Department, the message transmitting the plan shall include any adjustments which may be necessary in a work-year limitation established under paragraph (1) to reflect changes in the work-years required as a result of such plan.

(b) Not later than the end of the first fiscal year beginning after the effective date of this Act, the number of full-time equivalent personnel positions available for performing functions transferred to the Secretary or the Department by this Act shall be reduced by 500.

(c)(1) Computations required to be made for purposes of this section shall be made on the basis of all personnel employed by the Department, including experts and consultants employed under section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, and all other part-time and full-time personnel employed to perform functions of the Secretary or the Department, except personnel employed under special programs for students and disadvantaged youth (including temporary summer employment).

(2) The Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall, by rule, establish a method for computing work-years for personnel of the Department as described in paragraph (1).

Report to Congress.

(d) The Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall, as soon as practicable, but not later than one year after the effective date of this Act, prepare and transmit to the Congress a report on the effects on employees of the reorganization under this Act, which shall include—

(1) an identification of any position within the Department or elsewhere in the executive branch, which it considers unnecessary due to consolidation of functions under this Act;

(2) a statement of the number of employees entitled to pay savings by reason of the organization under this Act;

(3) a statement of the number of employees who are voluntarily or involuntarily separated by reason of such reorganization;

(4) an estimate of the personnel costs associated with such reorganization;

(5) the effects of such reorganization on labor management relations; and

(6) such legislative and administrative recommendations for improvements in personnel management within the Department as the Director considers necessary.

PART B—GENERAL ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

GENERAL AUTHORITY

20 USC 3471.

SEC. 411. (a) In carrying out any function transferred by this Act, the Secretary, or any officer or employee of the Department, may exercise any authority available by law (including appropriation Acts) with respect to such function to the official or agency from which such function is transferred, and the actions of the Secretary in exercising such authority shall have the same force and effect as when exercised by such official or agency.

(b)(1) The director of any office continued in the Department the director of which was required, prior to the effective date of this Act, to report to the Commissioner of Education or the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, shall report to the Secretary.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to delegate reporting requirements vested in the Secretary by paragraph (1) to any officer or employee of the Department.

DELEGATION

20 USC 3472. Sec. 412. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the Secretary may delegate any function to such officers and employees of the Department as the Secretary may designate, and may authorize such successive redelegations of such functions within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate. No delegation of functions by the Secretary under this section or under any other provision of this Act shall relieve the Secretary of responsibility for the administration of such functions.

REORGANIZATION

20 USC 3473. Sec. 413. (a) The Secretary is authorized, subject to the requirements of section 202(f), to allocate or reallocate functions among the officers of the Department, and to establish, consolidate, alter, or discontinue such organizational entities within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate, but the authority of the Secretary under this subsection does not extend to—

(1) any office, bureau, unit, or other entity transferred to the Department and established by statute or any function vested by statute in such an entity or officer of such an entity, except as provided in subsection (b);

(2) the abolition of organizational entities established by this Act; or

(3) the alteration of the delegation of functions to any specific organizational entity required by this Act.

(b)(1) The Secretary may, in accordance with paragraph (2) of this subsection, consolidate, alter, or discontinue any of the following statutory entities, or reallocate any functions vested by statute in the following statutory entities:

(A) the Office of Bilingual Education;
(B) the Teacher Corps;
(C) the Community College Unit;
(D) the National Center for Education Statistics;
(E) the National Institute of Education;
(F) the Office of Environmental Education;
(G) the Office of Consumers' Education;
(H) the Office of Libraries and Learning Resources;
(I) the Office of Indian Education;
(J) the Office of Career Education;
(K) the Office of Non-Public Education;
(L) the bureau for the education and training for the handicapped;
(M) the Institute of Museum Services; and
(N) the administrative units for guidance and counseling programs, the veterans' cost of instruction program, and the program for the gifted and talented children.

Congressional committees, notice.

(2) The Secretary may alter, consolidate, or discontinue any organizational entity continued within the Department and described in paragraph (1) of this subsection or reallocate any function vested by statute in such an entity, upon the expiration of a period of ninety days after the receipt by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsection and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of such proposed action.

RULES

20 USC 3474.

SEC. 414. (a) The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as the Secretary determines necessary or appropriate to administer and manage the functions of the Secretary or the Department.

20 USC 1232.

(b) The Secretary, in promulgating rules and regulations as authorized by statute, shall prescribe such rules and regulations in accordance with chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code. Section 431 of the General Education Provisions Act also shall apply to such rules and regulations to the extent applicable immediately prior to the effective date of this Act, and to rules and regulations promulgated with respect to programs transferred under sections 301(a) (1), (2), and (4), 302, 303, 304, 305, and 306.

CONTRACTS

40 USC 471 note.

SEC. 415. (a) Subject to the provisions of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, the Secretary is authorized to make, enter into, and perform such contracts, grants, leases, cooperative agreements, or other similar transactions with Federal or other public agencies (including State and local governments) and private organizations and persons, and to make such payments, by way of advance or reimbursement as the Secretary may determine necessary or appropriate to carry out functions of the Secretary or the Department.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no authority to enter into contracts or to make payments under this title shall be effective except to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance under appropriation Acts. This subsection shall not apply with respect to the authority granted under section 421.

REGIONAL AND FIELD OFFICES

20 USC 3476.

SEC. 416. The Secretary is authorized to establish, alter, discontinue, or maintain such regional or other field offices as the Secretary may find necessary or appropriate to perform functions of the Secretary or the Department.

ACQUISITION AND MAINTENANCE OF PROPERTY

20 USC 3477.

SEC. 417. (a) The Secretary is authorized—

(1) to acquire (by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise), construct, improve, repair, operate, and maintain—

(A) schools and related facilities (but only to the extent that operation of schools and related facilities by the Department is authorized by this Act);

(B) laboratories;

(C) research and testing sites and facilities;

(D) quarters and related accommodations for employees and dependents of employees of the Department; and

(E) personal property (including patents), or any interest therein, as may be necessary; and

(2) to provide by contract or otherwise for the establishment of eating facilities and other necessary facilities for the health and welfare of employees of the Department at its installations, and purchase and maintain equipment therefor.

20 USC 2564. (b) The authority available to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under section 524 of the Education Amendments of 1976 shall also be available to the Secretary.

(c) The authority granted by subsection (a) of this section shall be available only with respect to facilities of a special purpose nature that cannot readily be reassigned from similar Federal activities and are not otherwise available for assignment to the Department by the Administrator of General Services.

FACILITIES AT REMOTE LOCATIONS

20 USC 3478. SEC. 418. (a) The Secretary is authorized to provide, construct, or maintain for employees and their dependents stationed at remote locations as necessary and when not otherwise available at such remote locations—

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) dining facilities;

(4) audiovisual equipment, accessories, and supplies for recreation and training;

(5) reimbursement for food, clothing, medicine, and other supplies furnished by such employees in emergencies for the temporary relief of distressed persons;

(6) living and working quarters and facilities; and

(7) transportation for dependents of employees of the Department to the nearest appropriate educational facilities.

(b) The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subsection (a) shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of the cost of such work or services or used to refund excess sums when necessary.

USE OF FACILITIES

20 USC 3479. SEC. 419. (a)(1) With their consent, the Secretary may, with or without reimbursement, use the research, equipment, services, and facilities of any agency or instrumentality of the United States, of any State or political subdivision thereof, or of any foreign government, in carrying out any function of the Secretary or the Department.

(2) Notwithstanding the transfer of functions from the Secretary of Defense to the Secretary under section 302 (and the consequent transfer of personnel), all personnel performing such functions shall be treated, for the purpose of access to services and facilities provided by the Department of Defense, as employees of the Department of Defense.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to permit public and private agencies, corporations, associations, organizations, or individuals to use any real property, or any facilities, structures, or other improvements thereon, under the custody and control of the Secretary for Department purposes. The Secretary shall permit the use of such property, facilities, structures, or improvements under such terms and rates and for such period as may be in the public interest, except that the periods of such uses may not exceed five years. The Secretary may require permittees under this section to recondition and maintain, at their own expense, the real property, facilities, structures, and improvements used by such permittees to a standard satisfactory to the Secretary. This subsection shall not apply to excess property as defined in section 3(e) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949. 40 USC 472.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of the cost of such equipment or facilities provided or to refund excess sums when necessary.

(d) Any interest in real property acquired pursuant to this Act shall be acquired in the name of the United States Government.

COPYRIGHTS AND PATENTS

SEC. 420. The Secretary is authorized to acquire any of the following described rights if the property acquired thereby is for use by or for, or useful to, the Department: 20 USC 3480.

(1) copyrights, patents, and applications for patents, designs, processes, and manufacturing data;

(2) licenses under copyrights, patents, and applications for patents; and

(3) releases, before suit is brought, for past infringement of patents or copyrights.

GIFTS AND BEQUESTS

SEC. 421. The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts, bequests and devises of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts, bequests, and devises of money and proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts, bequests, or devises shall be deposited in the Treasury and shall be available for disbursement upon the order of the Secretary. 20 USC 3481.

TECHNICAL ADVICE

SEC. 422. (a) The Secretary is authorized, upon request, to provide advice, counsel, and technical assistance to applicants or potential applicants for grants and contracts and other interested persons with respect to any functions of the Secretary or the Department. 20 USC 3482.

(b) The Secretary may permit the consolidation of applications for grants or contracts with respect to two or more functions of the Secretary or the Department, but such consolidation shall not alter the statutory criteria for approval of applications for funding with respect to such functions.

WORKING CAPITAL FUND

SEC. 423. (a) The Secretary, with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, is authorized to establish for the Department a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal Establishment. 20 USC 3483.

year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interests of economy and efficiency, including such services as—

(1) a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its components;

(2) central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services;

(3) office space, central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and

(4) a central library service.

(b) The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing working capital and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less the related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such funds shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of agencies and offices in the Department, or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates that will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payment for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus of the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses considered) above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund. There shall be transferred to the fund the stocks of supplies, equipment, other assets, liabilities, and unpaid obligations relating to the services which the Secretary determines, with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, will be performed.

FUNDS TRANSFER

20 USC 3484.

SEC. 424. The Secretary may, when authorized in an appropriation Act in any fiscal year, transfer funds from one appropriation to another within the Department, except that no appropriation for any fiscal year shall be either increased or decreased pursuant to this section by more than 5 percent and no such transfer shall result in increasing any such appropriation above the amount authorized to be appropriated therefor.

SEAL OF DEPARTMENT

20 USC 3485.

SEC. 425. The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department of such design as the Secretary shall approve. Judicial notice shall be taken of such seal.

ANNUAL REPORT

Report to President and Congress.
20 USC 3486.

SEC. 426. (a) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year, make a single, comprehensive report to the President for transmission to the Congress on the activities of the Department during such fiscal year. The report shall include a statement of goals, priorities, and plans for the Department together with an assessment of the progress made toward—

(1) the attainment of such goals, priorities, and plans;

(2) the more effective and efficient management of the Department and the coordination of its functions; and

(3) the reduction of excessive or burdensome regulation and of unnecessary duplication and fragmentation in Federal education programs, accompanied where necessary by recommendations for proposed legislation for the achievement of such objectives.

Non-Federal personnel.

(b) The report required by subsection (a) shall also include an estimate of the extent of the non-Federal personnel employed pursuant to contracts entered into by the Department under section 415 or under any other authority (including any subcontract thereunder), the number of such contracts and subcontracts pursuant to which non-Federal personnel are employed, and the total cost of those contracts and subcontracts.

RELATIONSHIP TO GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS ACT

20 USC 1221.

SEC. 427. Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the General Education Provisions Act shall apply to functions transferred by this Act to the extent applicable on the day preceding the effective date of this Act.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

20 USC 3488.

SEC. 428. Subject to any limitation on appropriations applicable with respect to any function or office transferred to the Secretary or the Department, there are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1980 and each succeeding fiscal year such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and to enable the Secretary to administer and manage the Department. Funds appropriated in accordance with this section shall remain available until expended.

TITLE V—TRANSITIONAL, SAVINGS, AND CONFORMING PROVISIONS

TRANSFER AND ALLOCATION OF APPROPRIATIONS AND PERSONNEL

20 USC 3501.

SEC. 501. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the personnel employed in connection with, and the assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balance of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with the functions and offices, or portions thereof transferred by this Act, subject to section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, shall be transferred to the Secretary for appropriate allocation. Unexpended funds transferred pursuant to this subsection shall be used only for the purposes for which the funds were originally authorized and appropriated.

Unexpended funds.

(b) Positions expressly specified by statute or reorganization plan to carry out functions or offices transferred by this Act, personnel occupying those positions on the effective date of this Act, and personnel authorized to receive compensation in such positions at the rate prescribed for offices and positions at level IV or V of the Executive Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5315–5316) on the effective date of this Act, shall be subject to the provisions of section 503.

EFFECT ON PERSONNEL

20 USC 3502. Sec. 502. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the transfer pursuant to this title of full-time personnel (except special Government employees) and part-time personnel holding permanent positions shall not cause any such employee to be separated or reduced in grade or compensation for one year after the date of transfer to the Department.

(b) Any person who, on the day preceding the effective date of this Act, held a position compensated in accordance with the Executive Schedule prescribed in chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, and who, without a break in service is appointed in the Department to a position having duties comparable to the duties performed immediately preceding such appointment shall continue to be compensated in such new position at not less than the rate provided for such previous position, for the duration of the service of such person in such new position.

AGENCY TERMINATIONS

20 USC 3503. Sec. 503. (a)(1) On the effective date of this Act, the following entities shall terminate:

(A) the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the Office of Education;

(B) the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(C) the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(2) Whenever the President exercises the authority under section 302(a), the Office of Dependents' Education of the Department of Defense shall terminate.

(b) Each position which was expressly authorized by law, or the incumbent of which was authorized to receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level IV or V of the Executive Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5315–5316), in an office terminated pursuant to this Act shall also terminate.

INCIDENTAL TRANSFERS

20 USC 3504. Sec. 504. (a) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, at such time or times as the Director shall provide, is authorized and directed to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the functions, offices, or portions thereof transferred by this Act, and to make such additional incidental dispositions of personnel, assets, liabilities, grants, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with such functions, offices, or portions thereof, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Director shall provide for the termination of the affairs of all entities terminated by this Act and for such further measures and dispositions as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

(b) After consultation with the Director of the Office of Personnel Management, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget is authorized, at such time as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget provides, to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the transfer of positions within the Senior Executive Service in connection with functions and offices transferred by this Act.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 505. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, grants, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges— 20 USC 3505.

(2) which are in effect at the time this Act takes effect, shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or revoked in accordance with the law by the President, the Secretary, or other authorized official, a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(b)(1) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceedings, including notices of proposed rulemaking, or any application for any license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance pending on the effective date of this Act before any department, agency, commission, or component thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings and applications, to the extent that they relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued. Orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or revoked by the Secretary, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to prohibit the discontinuance or modification of any such proceeding under the same terms and conditions and to the same extent that such proceeding could have been discontinued or modified if this Act had not been enacted.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to promulgate regulations providing for the orderly transfer of proceedings continued under paragraph (1) to the Department. Regulations.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (e)—

(1) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the effective date of this Act, and

(2) in all such suits, proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

(d) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in the official capacity of such individual as an officer of any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act.

(e) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any department or agency, or officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer, is a party to a suit, and under this Act any function of such department, agency, or officer is transferred to the Secretary or any other official of the Department, then such suit shall be continued with the Secretary or other appropriate official of the Department substituted or added as a party.

(f) Orders and actions of the Secretary in the exercise of functions transferred under this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions Judicial review.

had been by the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions immediately preceding their transfer. Any statutory requirements relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Secretary.

SEPARABILITY

20 USC 3506. Sec. 506. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remainder of this Act nor the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall be affected thereby.

REFERENCE

20 USC 3507. Sec. 507. With respect to any function transferred by this Act and exercised on or after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any department, commission, or agency or any officer or office the functions of which are so transferred shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary, other official, or component of the Department to which this Act transfers such functions.

S. 991. A bill to establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

uates. In one of our major universities, nearly half of the freshman class was required to take remedial courses in English. Surely, we must make education a long-overdue national priority.

Why is a separate Department of Education needed? Leadership to handle the vast range of educational issues and programs is almost impossible within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare because of its immense size. This Department consists of a vast and diffuse range of responsibilities, agencies, and programs—all competing for attention. HEW's total spending for over 300 programs was $128 billion in 1976, in 1977 it is approximately $146 billion and the spendng for 1978 is expected to be $162 billion. This is an increase of $34 billion over a 2-year period and an annual averthe new Department of Education are presently in HEW, other education programs are fragmented and dispersed throughout more than 20 Federal agencies. No mechanism presently exists to coordinate these numerous programs in a sensible, workable and effective framework. By removing education functions out of HEW, education, health, and welfare will be more manageable to meet the many demands of our most needy citizens, and an effective reorganization of all three areas can more rapidly and more efficiently occur.

I am aware that Secretary of HEW Califano has announced a series of reorganization initiatives to improve HEW's manageability, and I commend him. But the need for a new Department of Education is still essential.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce along with Senators MAGNUSON, HUMPHREY, PELL, and NUNN and 28 of my distinguished colleagues, a bill to establish a separate Department of Education.

I first introduced a bill to establish a Department of Education in the 89th Congress. Today, such a Department is even more needed.

American education has grown rapidly. The needs and demands placed on education have greatly increased. Thirty years ago, fewer than half of American students finished high school. By 1974, the average school years attended was 12¼. Enrollment of blacks has increased by more than 200 percent in the past 8 years. The Office of Education expects women to receive almost half the college degrees awarded by 1978. Education is now becoming a lifelong process. Today, well over 60 million persons are enrolled in public and private education institutions from kindergarten through graduate school. That is almost one out of every three citizens.

Education is not given the priority attention it needs. We cannot help but become more aware that problems with our education system are worsening. In March of 1976, the Office of Education released a study showing a 10-year decline in reading skills among American students. In November 1975, the college entrance examination board reported that 1975 scores on the scholastic aptitude test showed the biggest drop in 20 years. College educators are more and more concerned about the low reading and writing ability of high school grad-age increase of over 15 percent. A large portion of this continued increase is caused by increased needs for social security and medicare.

The budget for Health and Welfare is 18 times as large as the $9.1 billion budget of the Education Division. Yet, the Education Division itself is enough to constitute a major department. Its budget alone is more than that of the Departments of the Interior, $5.5 billion; Commerce, $6.7 billion; Justice, $2.3 billion, and State, $1.2 billion. Its Office of Education administers 136 education programs. The proposed new Department of Energy is expected to cost $10 billion, just $1 billion more than the Education Division in HEW.

The unmanageability of this Department is widely known. Last year, the Governmental Affairs Committee reported a measure to establish an Office of Inspector General in HEW. Findings by the House Governmental Affairs Committee found that the magnitude and complexity of HEW's activities—including the administration of more than 300 separate programs involving expenditures over $118 billion—caused, in many instances, a lack of direct control over its expenditures, including evidence of fraud and abuse. Hearings by several subcommittees of the Governmental Affairs Committee have also outlined numerous examples of HEW mismanagement.

Education can never be a major priority in such a large Department. Uncontrollable programs will continue to grow and education will continue to be enmeshed and entangled with other priorities.

Although most of the components for Size, budget, and management considerations are good reasons alone to justify the creation of a new department. But these reasons are only the bureaucratic side of the picture.

American education needs a unified direction. It needs a full-time Secretary of Education who can devote all his or her enthusiasm, imagination, time and capability to strengthening American education.

No Secretary of such a large Department as HEW can adequately devote the time for the national education leadership needed. No Secretary of such a large department can give education the priority it should have.

This bill would address itself to the effective administration of our educational programs. The Secretary of Education would advise the President on goals and priorities. The Secretary would develop policies and programs to foster development of educational facilities and resources; exercise leadership in coordinating Federal activities affecting education; and provide leadership by conducting studies, making recommendations and administering discretionary programs to facilitate the continuing development of American education. Also, comprehensive planning by State and local governments would be encouraged.

Under the Secretary of Education, there would be an Under Secretary, a General Counsel, an Inspector General, and four Assistant Secretaries—for Legislation and Public Affairs, Intergovernmental Relations, Evaluation and Planning, and Administration and Management. Each officer would be subject to Senate confirmation.

The act would transfer HEW's Education Division, the Headstart program in the Office of Child Development, the Education Directorate of the National Science Foundation, the Armed Forces dependents schools, and jurisdiction over the National School Lunch Act, BIA Indian Schools, HUD college housing loans, and HEW's grant programs for the construction of public broadcasting facilities. Functions carried out by the Secretary through the Office of Civil Rights concerning the enforcement of those laws and education orders which apply to educational institutions, educational financial assistance and Federal contracts in education would be transferred.

The bill would also transfer the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities which is actively involved in promoting the cultural aspects of education. The National Endownments within the Foundation would retain their present structure under the bill and their inclusion would clearly lend itself to a broader view of education.

Other components of the bill would include a Federal Interagency Committee on Education, a National Advisory Committee on Education, and an Office of Inspector General.

The Federal Interagency Committee on Education would be chaired by the Secretary of Education. The committee would be composed of various representatives from other departments and agencies. Its main purpose would be to assure effective coordination of Federal programs affecting education. The committee would meet six times a year and report annually to the Secretary;

If there is one point on which most Americans will agree, it is that the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is too large and too bureaucratic to effectively or efficiently manage the numerous programs under its jurisdiction. This Department is currently charged with the task of administering vast programs designed to provide for the health needs of our citizens, to provide assistance to the elderly, the handicapped and the underprivileged, and to help the States provide quality education for every American. One of the biggest tasks facing President Carter and the Congress should be to restructure and reform this massive and cumbersome department.

The establishment of a separate Department of Education, which would be accomplished by the passage of the bill we are introducing today, is the first logical step toward achieving the goal of reorganization of HEW. At the present time, most of the Federal educational programs are administered by the U.S. Office of Education which is a relatively small subdivision of HEW. Yet, this Office of Education is alone responsible for approximately 120 programs. Its fiscal year 1976 budget was $7.4 billion which is larger than the combined budgets of the Departments of Commerce, Interior, Justice, and State.

For too long, our educational programs have failed to receive the attention and status that their importance demands. The lack of singular leadership in the educational field has also contributed to the lack of a coherent and effective Federal education policy. Education needs and deserves a single goals are important ones and we cannot gamble with their success. A single Department administered by a single Secretary is the best way of reaching these goals and of guaranteeing that our educational dollars are efficiently and economically spent in this process. The establishment of a Department of Education would represent a giant step toward the genuine reform needed in our educational programs.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Department of Education Act of 1977".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) education is of fundamental importance to the Nation and it is appropriate to reassess the condition of education in our Nation to insure that all Americans have an equal opportunity for quality education;

(2) existing Federal programs in support of education are fragmented and often duplicative and should be better coordinated in order to promote quality education;

(3) the role and importance of education increases as our society becomes more complex and new technologies and advancements are developed to meet changing needs;

(4) public policy toward education is vital to the present and long-range interests of the United States;

(5) education must be broadly conceived in terms of all those forces, institutions, and agencies which function as educating influences in the United States; goals, and institutions should be enhanced; and

(7) it is essential therefore to establish a Department of Education to provide Federal leadership, to insure effective enforcement of equal opportunity legislation in educa-

The National Advisory Commission on Education would be composed of 15 members, appointed by the President, who have demonstrated commitment to the educational needs of the Nation. Its purpose would be to assist the Secretary in the formulation of Federal policy with respect to the appropriate role of the Government in education and to review the administration, regulations for, and operation of Federal education programs;

The Inspector General whose functions would be similar to those of the present Inspector General in HEW, would provide and supervise policy direction for auditing and investigative activities in the Department. Other duties would include conducting activities to promote economy and efficiency while preventing and detecting fraud and abuse in education programs. The Inspector General could be removed only by the President.

Hearings have never been held on a proposed Department of Education, and it is my hope that the various components of the bill, including the proposed transfers, would be thoroughly discussed.

I urge my colleagues in Congress to join us in sponsoring this legislation. The time is long overdue for a cabinet Department of Education to coordinate education programs, eliminate duplication and waste, and strengthen and improve American education.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators RIBICOFF, MAGNUSON, HUMPHREY, PELL, and others in introducing legislation to create a separate Department of Education to administer and oversee all educational programs and policies for the Federal Government. We need a spokesman who can articulate educational priorities, plans, and programs at the highest levels of Government.

The bill that we are introducing today will provide a more efficient and administratively manageable structure for education by removing the Office of Education from the existing Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It will also consolidate education programs, which are currently fragmented throughout the Federal Government, under the new Department of Education. This consolidation should insure that duplication of programs and needless waste of money is avoided.

This bill also creates an independent Office of Inspector General in the new Department to prevent fraud and abuse in education programs. During the 94th Congress, legislation was signed into law to establish an Office of Inspector General in HEW. It is certainly important that a single person in the new Department of Education be responsible for fraud detection and for insuring that the taxpayers' funds appropriated for educational programs are not wasted because of inefficiency and abuse.

The creation of a separate Department of Education would not only enhance our educational policies but would also give new prominence to our health and welfare programs. The Secretary of Health and Welfare could devote his full time and efforts to meeting the pressing health needs of our citizens and to cleaning up the management of our welfare programs.

Investment in education is investment in the future productivity of our Nation through the advancement of skills of the workers of tomorrow. Our educational tion, to weigh and consider major educational policy issues confronting the Nation, and to facilitate a continuing renewal of the educating institutions and policies of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ESTABLISHED

SEC. 3. There is established an executive department which shall be known as the Department of Education (hereinafter referred to as the "Department").

OFFICERS

SEC. 4. (a) The Department shall be administered by a Secretary of Education (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary"), who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level I of the Federal Executive Salary Schedule under section 5312 of title 5, United States Code. The Department shall be administered under the supervision and direction of the Secretary.

(b) There shall be in the Department an Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Under Secretary shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level III of the Federal Executive Salary Schedule established under section 5314 of title 5, United States Code.

(c) There shall be in the Department a General Counsel and four Assistant Secretaries of Education as follows:

1. Assistant Secretary of Education for Legislative and Public Affairs;

2. Assistant Secretary of Education for Administrative and Management Policy;

3. Assistant Secretary of Education for Evaluation and Planning; and

4. Assistant Secretary of Education for Intergovernmental Relations.

Each of such Assistant Secretaries shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each such Assistant Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary or of the Under Secretary, an Assistant Secretary determined according to such order as the Secretary shall prescribe shall act as Secretary. Each Assistant Secretary and the General Counsel shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level IV under section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary shall be responsible for the exercise of all functions of the Department, and shall have authority to direct and supervise all personnel and activities thereof.

(b)(1) The Secretary is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, and prescribe their functions, as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and functions of this Act.

(2) The Secretary may obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code.

(c) The Secretary may promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the functions vested in the Secretary or in the Department, and may delegate authority for the performance of any such function to any officer or employee under the Secretary's direction and supervision.

(d) The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department, of such design as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken thereof.

FUNCTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 6. (a) It is the principal function of the Department to promote the cause and advancement of education throughout the United States.

(b) In addition to any other function of the Secretary under the provisions of this Act, the Secretary is authorized to—

ADDITIONAL TRANSFERS

SEC. 8. The President is authorized to transfer to the Department of Education any other agency or instrumentality of the Federal Government which the President determines has functions relating to education and should be transferred to the Department of Education to promote efficiency in Government and to carry out the purposes of this Act. Such transfers shall incorporate, to the extent deemed desirable, the recommendations of the Federal Interagency Committee on Education as provided by section 12(c) and shall be completed within one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act. A report describing such transfers shall be submitted to the Congress not later than thirty days thereafter.

TRANSFERRED PERSONNEL

SEC. 9. Each officer or employee of the United States or any department or agency thereof who is transferred at any time to the Department of Education shall be deemed, effective as of the date of such transfer, to be an officer or employee of the Department. No reappointment of any such officer or employee shall be required because of his transfer to that Department. Except as otherwise specifically provided by this section, no such officer or employee shall be reduced in rank, grade, seniority, or rate of compensation because of any such transfer.

ing students in their transition from school to work; and

(6) full and effective cooperation with the Secretary on such studies and analyses as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(c) The Committee shall, within 90 days of the enactment of this Act or the appointment and qualification of all Committee members, whichever is earlier, recommend to the President the transfer of such additional responsibilities as may be appropriate.

(d) The Committee shall be composed of the Secretary, who shall be the Chairperson, and one appropriate representative of each of the following agencies: The Department of State, the Department of Defense, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Labor, the Department of Health and Welfare (as redesignated by section 11 of this Act), the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the National Sicence Foundation, and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The Committe shall also include the Chairpersons of the National Endowment for the Arts, and the National Endowment for the Humanities of the Department.

(e) The Chairperson may invite Federal agencies, in addition to the agencies which are represented on the Committee under the provisions of subsection (d) of this section, to designate representatives to participate in meetings of the Committee on matters of substantial interest to such agencies which are to be considered by the Committee.

(f) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairperson of the Council of Economic Advisers, and the Executive Director of the Domestic Council may each designate a staff member to attend meetings of the Committee as observers.

(g) The Committee shall meet at last six times in each year and shall prepare an annual report to the Secretary concerning its recommendations.

(h) Each Federal agency which is represented on the Committee under the provisions of subsection (d) of this section, shall furnish necessary assistance to the Committee in accordance with section 214 of the Act of May 3, 1945 (31 U.S.C. 691).

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON EDUCATION

Sec. 13. (a) There is established a National Advisory Commission on Education (hereinafter referred to as the "National Commission") composed of fifteen members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among individuals—

(1) who have a demonstrated commitment, in public or private industries or organizations, for the enhancement and development of the educational needs and goals of the Nation;

(2) who have competence in assessing the progress of educational agencies, institutions, and organizations in meeting those needs and achieving those goals; and

(3) who are experienced with the policies or administration of State and local educational agencies and of institutions of higher education.

Members shall be appointed for terms of three years, except that (A) in the case of initially appointed members, as designated [illegible] the President, five members shall be ap[illegible]nted for terms of one year, five members shall be appointed for terms of two years, and five members shall be appointed for terms of three years, and (B) any member appointed to fill a vacancy shall serve the remainder of the term for which the member's predecessor was appointed.

(b) The National Commission shall—

(1) assist the Secretary in the formulation of Federal policy with respect to the appropriate role of the Federal Government in each action;

(2) review the administration of, general regulations for, and operation of Federal education programs;

(3) advise the Secretary and other Federal officials with respect to the educational deems appropriate, to the President and to the Congress, concerning its findings, recommendations, and activities.

(d) In carrying out its responsibilities under this section, the National Commission shall take, together with the Secretary, whatever action is necessary to carry out section 448 of the General Education Provisions Act, to devise a manageable and effective advisory structure for the Department. The National Commission shall advise the Secretary on the number of advisory bodies that are necessary and the manner in which such bodies relate to one another. The National Commission shall consult with the National Advisory Council on the Education of Disadvantaged Children, the National Advisory Council on Educational Research, and such other advisory councils and committees as may be appropriate to carry out its functions under this subsection. All Federal agencies are directed to cooperate with the National Commission in carrying out its functions under this subsection.

(e) The National Commission is authorized to procure such technical assistance as may be required to carry out its functions and the Secretary shall, in addition, make available to the National Commission such secretarial, clerical, and other assistance and such pertinent data prepared by the Department as the National Commission may require to carry out its functions.

(f) Members of the National Commission who are not in the regular full-time employ of the United States shall, while attending meetings or conferences of the National Commission or while otherwise engaged in the business of the National Commission, be entitled to receive compensation at a rate fixed by the Secretary, but not exceeding the rate specified at the time of such service for grade GS-18 under section 3332 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime, and while so serving on the business of the National Commission away from their homes or regular places of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by sec-

(f) The Inspector General and the Deputy shall each be subject to the provisions of subchapter III of chapter 73, title 5, United States Code, notwithstanding any exemption from such provisions which might otherwise apply.

(g) It shall be the duty and responsibility of the Inspector General—

(1) to supervise, coordinate, and provide policy direction for auditing and investigate activities relating to programs and operations of the Department;

(2) to recommend policies for, and to conduct, supervise, or coordinate other activities carried out or financed by the Department for the purpose of promoting economy and efficiency in the administration of, or preventing and detecting fraud and abuse in, its programs and operations;

(3) to recommend policies for, and to conduct, supervise, or coordinate relationships between the Department and other Federal agencies, State and local governmental agencies, and nongovernmental entities with respect to (A) all matters relating to the promotion of economy and efficiency in the administration of, or the prevention and detection of fraud and abuse in, programs and operations administered or financed by the Department, or (B) the identification and prosecution of participants in such fraud or abuse; and

(4) to keep the Secretary and the Congress fully and currently informed, by means of the reports required by subsection (i) and otherwise, concerning fraud and other serious problems, abuses, and deficiencies relating to the administration of programs and operations administered or financed by the Department, to recommend corrective action concerning such problems, abuses, and deficiencies, and to report on the progress made in implementing such corrective action.

(h) In carrying out the responsibilities specified in subsection (g)(1), the Inspector General shall have authority to approve or disapprove the use of outside auditors or to take other appropriate steps to insure the needs and goals of the Nation and assess the progress of the renewal of appropriate agencies, institutions, and organizations of the Nation in order to meet those needs and achieve those goals;

(4) conduct objective evaluations of specific education programs and projects in order to ascertain the effectiveness of such programs and projects in achieving the purpose for which they are intended;

(5) make recommendations (including recommendations for changes in legislation) for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs;

(6) consult with Federal, State, and local and other education agencies, institutions, and organizations with respect to assessing education in the United States and the improvement of the quality of education, including—

(A) areas of unmet needs in education, national goals, and changing education priorities, and the means by which those areas may be met, developed, and achieved;

(B) specific means of improving the quality and effectiveness of teaching, curriculums, and educational media and of raising standards of scholarship and levels of achievement;

(7) conduct national conferences on the assessment, improvement, and renewal of education, in which national and regional education associations and organizations, State and local education officers and administrators, and other education-related organizations, institutions, and persons (including parents of children participating in Federal educational assistance programs) may exchange and disseminate information on the improvement of education;

(8) conduct, and report on, comparative studies and evaluations of education systems in foreign countries; and

(9) advise and assist in the coordination of all Federal educational advisory committees, councils or commissions.

(e) The National Commission shall make an annual report, and such other reports as it tion 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons employed intermittently in the Government service.

(g) The President shall nominate members to the National Commission not later than thirty days after the date of enactment of this Act.

OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL

SEC. 14. (a) As used in this section—

(1) the term "Inspector General" means the Inspector General of the Department;

(2) the term "Deputy" means the Deputy Inspector General of the Department; and

(3) the term "Federal agency" means an agency as defined in section 552(e) of title 5, United States Code, but shall not be construed to include the General Accounting Office.

(b) There is hereby established in the Department an Office of Inspector General.

(c) There shall be at the head of the Office an Inspector General who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, solely on the basis of integrity and demonstrated ability and without regard to political affiliation. The Inspector General shall report to and be under the general supervision of the Secretary or, to the extent such authority is delegated, the Under Secretary, but shall not be under the control of, or subject to supervision by, any other officer of the Department.

(d) There shall also be in the Office a Deputy Inspector General appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, solely on the basis of integrity and demonstrated ability and without regard to political affiliation. The Deputy shall assist the Inspector General in the administration of the Office and shall, during the absence or temporary incapacity of the Inspector General, or during a vacancy in that office, act as Inspector General.

(e) The Inspector General or the Deputy may be removed from office by the President. The President shall communicate the reasons for any such removal to both Houses of Congress.

competence and independence of such auditors.

(i) In carrying out the duties and responsibilities provided by this section, the Inspector General shall give particular regard to the activities of the Comptroller General of the United States with a view to avoiding duplication and insuring effective coordination and cooperation.

(j) The Inspector General shall, not later than March 31 of each year, submit a report to the Secretary and to the Congress summarizing the activities of the Office during the preceding calendar year. Such report shall include, but need not be limited to—

(1) an identification and description of significant problems, abuses, and deficiencies relating to the administration of programs and operations of the Department disclosed by such activities;

(2) a description of recommendations for corrective action made by the Office with respect to significant problems, abuses, or deficiencies identified and described under paragraph (1);

(3) an evaluation of progress made in implementing recommendations described in the report or, where appropriate, in previous reports; and

(4) a summary of matters referred to prosecutive authorities and the extent to which prosecutions and convictions have resulted.

(k) The Inspector General shall make reports on a quarterly basis to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees or subcommittees of the Congress identifying any significant problems, abuses, or deficiencies concerning which the Office has made a recommendation for corrective action and on which, in the judgment of the Inspector General, adequate progress is not being made.

(l) The Inspector General shall report immediately to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees or subcommittees of the Congress whenever the Office becomes aware of particularly serious or flagrant problems, abuses, or deficiencies relating to the administration of programs and operations of the Department. The Deputy and Assistant Inspectors General shall have particular responsibility for informing the Inspector General of such problems, abuses, or deficiencies.

(m) The Inspector General (A) may make such additional investigations and reports relating to the administration of the programs and operations of the Department as are, in the judgment of the Inspector General, necessary or desirable, and (B) shall provide such additional information or documents as may be requested by either House of Congress or, with respect to matters within their jurisdiction, by any committee or subcommittee thereof.

(n) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the reports, information, or documents required by or under this section shall be transmitted to the Secretary and the Congress, or committees or subcommittees thereof, by the Inspector General without further clearance or approval. The Inspector General shall, insofar as feasible, provide copies of the reports required under subsections (j) and (k) to the Secretary sufficiently in advance of the due date for their submission to Congress to provide a reasonable opportunity for comments of the Secretary to be appended to the reports when submitted to Congress.

(o) In addition to the authority otherwise provided by this section, the Inspector General, in carrying out the provisions of this section, is authorized—

(1) to have access to all records, reports, audits, reviews, documents, papers, recommendations, or other material available to the Department which related to programs and operations with respect to which the Inspector General has responsibilities under this section;

(2) to request such information or assistance as may be necessary for carrying out the duties and responsibilities provided by this section from any Federal, State, or local governmental agency or unit thereof;

(3) to require by subpena the production of all information, documents, reports, answers, records, accounts, papers, and other data and documentary evidence necessary in requested under subsection (o)(1) or (o)(2) is, in the judgment of the Inspector General, unreasonably refused or not provided, the Inspector General shall report the circumstances to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees or subcommittees of the Congress without delay.

(3) In the event any record or other information requested by the Inspector General under subsection (o)(1) or (o)(2) is not considered to be available under the provisions of section 552a(b) (1), (3), or (7) of title 5, United States Code, such record or information shall be available to the Inspector General in the same manner and to the same extent it would be available to the Comptroller General.

(q) The Secretary shall provide the Inspector General and his staff with appropriate and adequate office space at central and field office locations of the Department, together with such equipment, office supplies, and communications facilities and services as may be necessary for the operation of such offices, and shall provide necessary maintenance services for such offices and the equipment and facilities located therein.

(r)(1) The Inspector General shall receive compensation at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule by section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) The Deputy shall receive compensation at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule by section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

(s) There are hereby transferred to the Office of Inspector General the functions, powers, and duties of the Office of Inspector General in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare established under title II of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize conveyance of the interests of the United States in certain lands in Salt Lake County, Utah, to Shriners' Hospitals for Crippled Children, a Colorado corporation," approved October 18, 1976 (90 Stat. 2429) which the Director of the Office of Management and Budget determines to be principally involved in education.

effect any proceedings pending at the time this section takes effect before any agency or office, or part thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings, to the extent that they relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued before the Department of Education. Such proceedings, to the extent they do not relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued before the agency or office, or part thereof, before which they were pending at the time of such transfer. In either case orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or repealed by the Secretary of Education, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(A) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the date this section takes effect, and

(B) in all such suits proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered, in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in the officer's official capacity as an officer of any agency or office, or part thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any agency or office, or part thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in the officer's official capacity shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. Causes of actions, suits, or other proceedings may be asserted by or against the United States or such official of the Department of Education as may be appropriate and, in any litigation pending when this section takes effect, the court may at any time, on its own motion or that of any party, enter an order which will give the performance of the functions assigned by this section, which subpena, in the case of contumacy or refusal to obey, shall be enforceable by order of any appropriate United States district court;

(4) to have direct and prompt access to the Secretary when necessary for any purpose pertaining to the performance of functions and responsibilities under this section;

(5) in the event that a budget request for the Office of Inspector General is reduced, before submission to Congress, to an extent which the Inspector General deems seriously detrimental to the adequate performance of the functions mandated by this section, the Inspector General shall so inform the Congress without delay;

(6) to select, appoint, and employ such officers and employees as may be necessary for carrying out the functions, powers, and duties of the Office subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates;

(7) to obtain services as authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, at daily rates not to exceed the equivalent rate prescribed for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule by section 5332 of title 5, United States Code;

(8) to the extent and in such amounts as may be provided in advance by appropriations Acts, to enter into contracts and other arrangements for audits, studies, analyses, and other services with public agencies and with private persons, and to make such payments as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

(p)(1) Upon request of the Inspector General for information or assistance under subsection (o)(2), the head of any Federal agency involved shall, insofar as is practicable, and not in contravention of any existing statutory restriction, or regulation of the Federal agency from which the information is requested, furnish to the Inspector General, or to an authorized designee, such information or assistance.

(2) Whenever information or assistance

(t) The personnel, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available or to be made available, of any office or agency the functions, powers, and duties of which are transferred under subsection (s) are hereby transferred to the Office of Inspector General.

(u) Personnel transferred pursuant to subsection (t) shall be transferred in accordance with applicable laws and regulations relating to the transfer of functions except that the classification and compensation of such personnel shall not be reduced for one year after such transfer.

(v) In any case where all the functions, powers, and duties of any office or agency are transferred pursuant to this subsection, such office or agency shall lapse. Any person who, on the effective date of this section, held a position compensated in accordance with the Executive Schedule, and who, without a break in service, is appointed in the Office to a position having duties comparable to those performed immediately preceding such appointment shall continue to be compensated in the new position at not less than the rate provided for the previous position, for the duration of service in the new position.

SAVING PROVISIONS

Sec. 15. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges—

(1) which have been issued, made, granted, or allowed to become effective in the exercise of functions which are transferred under this Act, by (A) any agency or office or part thereof, any functions of which are transferred by this Act, or (B) any court of competent jurisdiction, and

(2) which are in effect at the time this Act takes effect, shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or repealed by the Secretary of Education by any court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(b) The provisions of this Act shall not effect to the provisions of this subsection.

(2) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any agency or office, or officer thereof in the officer's official capacity, is a party to a suit, and under this Act—

(A) such agency or office, or any part thereof, is transferred to the Secretary of Education,

(B) any function of such agency, office, or part thereof; or officer is transferred to the Secretary of Education, then such suit shall be continued by the Secretary of Education (except in the case of a suit not involving functions transferred to the Secretary of Education in which case the suit shall be continued by the agency, office, or part thereof, or officer which was a party to the suit prior to the effective date of this Act).

(d) With respect to any function transferred by this Act and exercised after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any agency, office, or part thereof, or officer so transferred or functions of which are so transferred shall be deemed to mean the department or officer in which such function is vested pursuant to this Act.

(e) Orders and actions of the Secretary of Education in the exercise of functions transferred under this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions had been by the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions, immediately preceding their transfer. Any statutory requirements relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Secretary.

(f) In the exercise of the functions transferred under this Act, the Secretary shall have the same authority as that vested in the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions immediately preceding their transfer, and the Secretary's actions in exercising such functions shall have the same force and effect as when exercised by such agency or office, or part thereof.

(g) The Secretary, in addition to the authority to delegate and redelegate contained in any other Act in the exercise of the functions transferred in this Act to the Secretary may delegate any of such functions to such officers and employees of the Department, as the Secretary may designate, may authorize such successive redelegations of such functions as the Secretary may deem appropriate and may make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out functions of the Secretary.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 16. (a) The Secretary is authorized to establish a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interest of economy and efficiency in the Department including such services as a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its agencies; central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services; office space, central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and a central library service. The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing capital (which appropriations are hereby authorized) and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less the related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such fund shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of agencies and offices in the Department or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates which will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payment for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the United States shall be disbursed upon order of the Secretary.

(d) Nothing contained in this section is intended to amend, modify, or repeal any provisions of law administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare which authorize the making of contracts for research.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 17. The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year, prepare a report to the President for submission to the Congress on the activities of the Department during the preceding fiscal year. Each such report shall also contain objective data regarding changing trends in education, including enrollments, expenditures, numbers of teachers and other categories of professional and related personnel; special needs of critical concern such as the disadvantaged, rural, and urban education, and progress made toward the continuing renewal of education; the results and outcomes of education and schooling, including the overall results on generally recognized standard examinations for entrance to undergraduate and graduate institutions; budget projections for five years based on actual or anticipated appropriations for the fiscal year in which the annual report is issued; recommendations as to the improvement of programs for the handicapped and recommendations with respect to the advisory structure of the Department, including the names and composition of advisory committees and councils and the relationships the committees and councils bear to one another and recommendations as to the elimination of overlapping advisory committees and similar data.

CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 18. (a) Section 19(d)(1) of title 3, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare"; and for Legislative and Public Affairs.

(2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "Secretary of Health and Welfare, Secretary of Education".

"(115) Assistant Secretary of Education for Administrative and Management Policy.

"(116) Assistant Secretary of Education for Evaluation and Planning.

"(117) Assistant Secretary of Education for Intergovernmental Relations.

"(118) General Counsel, Department of Education.

"(119) Inspector General, Department of Education.".

EXPENDITURES AUTHORIZED

SEC. 19. The Secretary is authorized to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, for lawbooks, books of reference and periodicals, and for printing and binding) as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act, and as may be provided for by the Congress from time to time.

APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 20. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to enable the Department to carry out the provisions of this Act and to perform any other duties which may be imposed upon it by law.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 21. The provisions of this Act shall be effective on its date of enactment.

S. 991—A DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in introducing a bill which will create a Cabinet-level Department of Education. This bill, the Department of Education Act of 1977, makes good on our promise that the education of our people will become a critical priority of our Nation. By bringing all educational programs together under one Department with Cabinet status, this proposal brings our commitment to quality education, equal op-

Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus found in the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses) considered above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund.

(b) In addition to the authority contained in any other Act which is transferred to and vested in the Secretary as necessary, and when not otherwise available, the Secretary is authorized to provide for, construct, or maintain the following for employees and their dependents stationed at remote localities:

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) motion picture equipment and film for recreation and training; and

(4) living and working quarters and facilities.

The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary and the proceeds therefrom shall be credited to the appropriation from which the expenditure was made.

(c)(1) The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts and bequests of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts and bequests of money and the proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts or bequests shall be deposited in the Treasury in a separate fund and shall be disbursed upon order of the Secretary.

(2) Upon the request of the Secretary the Secretary of the Treasury may invest and reinvest in securities of the United States or in securities guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States any monies contained in the fund provided for in paragraph (1). Income accruing from such securities, and from any other property held by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be deposited to the credit of the fund, and

(b) Section 101 of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "Health, Education, and Welfare." and inserting "Health and Welfare."; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof: "The Department of Education.".

(c) Section 5312 of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out

"(10) Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare."

and inserting in lieu thereof

"(10) Secretary of Health and Welfare.";

(2) by striking out "(13)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(14)"; and

(3) by inserting immediately after the following:

"(12) Secretary of Transportation."

"(13) Secretary of Education.".

(d) Section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out

"(6) Under Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare."

and inserting in lieu thereof:

"(6) Under Secretary of Health and Welfare.";

and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(62) Under Secretary of Education.".

(e) Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "Assistant Secretaries of Health, Education, and Welfare (5)" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Assistant Secretaries of Health and Welfare (4)";

(2) by striking out "General Counsel of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare." and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "General Counsel of the Department of Health and Welfare."; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(114) Assistant Secretary of Education

portunity, and an enlightened citizenry to the center of policymaking at the Federal level.

Specifically, this act would transfer HEW's Education Division, including the 138 education programs within the Office of Education, the Head Start program in the Office of Child Development, the Education Directorate of the National Science Foundation, the Armed Forces dependents' schools, and jurisdiction over the National School Lunch Act, BIA Indian Schools, HUD college housing loans, and HEW's grant programs for the construction of public broadcasting facilities to the new Department.

It would also transfer the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities which is actively involved in promoting the cultural aspects of education. The National Endowments within the Foundation would retain their present structure under the bill and their inclusion would clearly lend itself to a broader view of education.

The future of American education and our national educational policy rests, I believe, on our continuing and informed discussion of ways to improve the education of our children and to allow people of all ages to take advantage of various learning experiences.

Over the last several years, Federal education policy has taken major steps toward those goals.

Certainly, enactment of the Education for All Handicapped Children Act, which I authored, provided new hope and new direction for handicapped children and their families. That law signaled the Federal Government's concern and insistence that these children be assured their right to a free public education.

The development of the basic educational opportunity grant, the Bilingual Education Act, a new program for lifelong learning, expanded programs for continuing education, and better coordination in vocational education are also important steps in this direction.

Yet, today, the Federal contribution to elementary, secondary, and higher education is just over 9.8 percent of all expenditures in this area. Given the increasing costs of education and the increasing pressures on State and local tax dollars, this contribution must be seen as a basic minimum.

Yet, we know that these figures represent a decrease from a higher level of 11.9 percent in the late 1960's. In terms of the proportion of the gross national product, expenditures in the education area have remained at just under 8 percent for the last 10 years.

We also know the hard facts in individual programs. For example, in title I, aid to disadvantaged children, our expenditures in dollars of constant value—1965 dollars—were $1.161 billion in fiscal year 1966 compared to only $1.081 billion in fiscal year 1976—a 7-percent reduction. I was very pleased that Secretary Califano has recognized this problem and that the fiscal year 1978 budget reflects increased funding for title I.

The issue, however, is broader than a single program or a single budgetary increase. The question that is raised is the ability of our national education leaders—the Commissioner of Education, the Assistant Secretary and the Director of the National Institute of Education—to provide the Federal advocacy necessary in education when the Education Division is only a part of a department with high budgetary and program responsibilities in other areas. This issue has been raised more clearly over the past few years as HEW's spending has grown to more than $145 billion. Most of this growth is a result of uncontrollable budget items in health and welfare. The Education Division budget of $9 billion is dwarfed in comparision—and in priority in day-to-day management and policymaking.

Clearly, I do not question the necessity of HEW nor the importance of its other programs—many of which also evolve from the committee I chair. My desire is to define a coherent and coordinated policy in education and to increase its visibility and importance in the Cabinet. In saying this, I realize that the creation of a Department of Education does not automatically solve these problems and in many cases raises additional policy issues which will have to be examined.

For example, I am sure that we will want to examine carefully the inclusion of each of the programs which is suggested to be transferred in this bill. Such issues as the location of Head Start and its relationship to other community-based poverty and social service programs needs to be fully explored for this program is not intended to be exclusively a school-based program. Similarly, the proposal to transfer the Office of Civil Rights' education-related enforcement responsibilities also needs to be explored further in light of the importance of these enforcement activities, the need for a consistent policy in all civil rights enforcement, and the impact on enforcement of section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, prohibiting discrimination against handicapped individuals.

Furthermore, it should be made absolutely clear, in the course of considering this legislation, that the establishment of a separate Department of Education does not imply any diminution of the role of the Department of Labor in providing skill training, job counseling, work experience and other employment services. A fundamental challenge for the new administration is to develop comprehensive, long-term policies for helping young Americans make the difficult transition from school to work. An associated challenge is to strengthen significantly existing approaches for affording workers of all ages the opportunity for retraining, the means of locating new and better jobs, and the wherewithal to be able to move their homes to communities that need their new skills. If learning is a life-long process, then the transition from classroom to work is a life-long challenge. With or without a separate Federal educational department, the Department of Labor and Federal education officials must be brought into effective coordination of joint efforts to weld together the elements of employment and education policy.

I believe that our highest priorities in education must be to increase opportunity for all of our people, no matter what their age, their socioeconomic background, or their previous schooling and to find new ways to allow personal freedom and dignity in the educational process.

I believe the way to assure that we as a Nation accomplish this goal is by creating a seperate Department of Education. It is for this reason that I lend my full support to this concept and join with my colleagues in introducing the Department of Education Act of 1977. I look forward to the hearings on this issue.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

March 14 (legislative day, February 21), 1977

Mr. Ribicoff (for himself, Mr. Magnuson, Mr. Humphrey, Mr. Pell, Mr. Nunn, Mr. Allen, Mr. Bartlett, Mr. Bayh, Mr. Bellmon, Mr. Chiles, Mr. Church, Mr. Clark, Mr. Cranston, Mr. DeConcini, Mr. Domenici, Mr. Eagleton, Mr. Ford, Mr. Hart, Mr. Heinz, Mr. Hollings, Mr. Inouye, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. McGovern, Mr. Matsunaga, Mr. Melcher, Mr. Muskie, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Randolph, Mr. Sasser, Mr. Sparkman, Mr. Stafford, Mr. Stone, Mr. Weicker, and Mr. Williams) introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs

A BILL

To establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Department of Education Act of 1977".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

Sec. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) education is of fundamental importance to the Nation and it is appropriate to reassess the condition of education in our Nation to insure that all Americans have an equal opportunity for quality education;

(2) existing Federal programs in support of education are fragmented and often duplicative and should be better coordinated in order to promote quality education;

(3) the role and importance of education increases as our society becomes more complex and new technologies and advancements are developed to meet changing needs;

(4) public policy toward education is vital to the present and long-range interests of the United States;

(5) education must be broadly conceived in terms of all those forces, institutions, and agencies which function as educating influences in the United States; goals and institutions should be enhanced; and

(6) it is essential therefore to establish a Department of Education to provide Federal leadership, to insure effective enforcement of equal opportunity legislation in education, to weigh and consider major educational policy issues confronting the Nation, and to facilitate a continuing renewal of the educating institutions and policies of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ESTABLISHED

Sec. 3. There is established an executive department which shall be known as the Department of Education (hereinafter referred to as the "Department").

OFFICERS

SEC. 4. (a) The Department shall be administered by a Secretary of Education (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary"), who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level I of the Federal Executive Salary Schedule under section 5312 of title 5, United States Code. The Department shall be administered under the supervision and direction of the Secretary.

(b) There shall be in the Department an Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Under Secretary shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level III of the Federal Executive Salary Schedule established under section 5314 of title 5, United States Code.

(c) There shall be in the Department a General Counsel and four Assistant Secretaries of Education as follows:

(1) Assistant Secretary of Education for Legislative and Public Affairs;

(2) Assistant Secretary of Education for Administrative and Management Policy;

(3) Assistant Secretary of Education for Evaluation and Planning; and

(4) Assistant Secretary of Education for Intergovernmental Relations.

Each of such Assistant Secretaries shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each such Assistant Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary or of the Under Secretary, an Assistant Secretary determined according to such order as the Secretary shall prescribe shall act as Secretary. Each Assistant Secretary and the General Counsel shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level IV under section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary shall be responsible for the exercise of all functions of the Department, and shall have authority to direct and supervise all personnel and activities thereof.

(b) (1) The Secretary is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, and prescribe their functions, as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and functions of this Act.

(2) The Secretary may obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code.

(c) The Secretary may promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the functions vested in the Secretary or in the Department, and may delegate authority for the performance of any such function to any officer or employee under the Secretary's direction and supervision.

(d) The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department, of such design as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken thereof.

FUNCTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 6. (a) It is the principal function of the Department to promote the cause and advancement of education throughout the United States.

(b) In addition to any other function of the Secretary under the provisions of this Act, the Secretary is authorized to—

(1) advise the President with respect to the progress of education, including the recommendation of long-range goals and priorities;

(2) develop and recommend to the President appropriate policies and programs to foster the orderly growth and development of the educational facilities and resources of the United States especially in the light of long-range requirements;

(3) exercise leadership at the direction of the President in coordinating Federal activities affecting education;

(4) conduct continuing comprehensive surveys, and to collect, analyze, and disseminate relevant information, data, and statistics, concerning education in the United States;

(5) provide information and such other assistance as may be authorized by the Congress to aid in the maintenance of efficient school, college, and university or other education systems;

(6) encourage comprehensive planning by State and local governments, especially with respect to coordinating Federal, State, and community educational activities at the local level; and

(7) provide leadership by conducting studies, making recommendations, and administering discretionary programs to facilitate the continuing development of the American educational system.

TRANSFER OF FUNCTIONS AND AGENCIES

SEC. 7. (a) There are transferred to the Secretary, all functions of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare or the Commissioner of Education, as the case may be—

(1) with respect to and being administered by the Secretary through the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(2) with respect to and being administered by the Secretary through the Office of Child Development of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare regarding Headstart;

(3) any advisory committee in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare giving advice to and making recommendations which concern education primarily;

(4) under section 394 of the Communications Act of 1934; relating to Federal grants for the construction of television and radio broadcasting facilities to be used for educational purposes;

(5) with respect to and being administered by the Secretary through the Office of Civil Rights for the enforcement of those provisions of law and education orders which apply to educational institutions, including title VI (insofar as it relates to educational financial assistance) and titles VII and IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 and Executive Order 11246 (insofar as it pertains to employer's holding Federal contracts in education);

(6) with respect to all functions of the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities including all functions of the National Endowment for the Arts and all functions of the National Endowment for the Humanities;

(7) with respect to all Federal laws concerning the relationship between Gallaudet College, Howard University, and American Printing House for the Blind, and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(8) with respect to the operation of schools for dependents of members of the Armed Forces by the Secretary of Defense;

(9) with respect to the operation of schools for Indian children being administered by the Secretary of the Interior through the Bureau of Indian Affairs;

(10) with respect to the National School Lunch Act, and the operation of the Graduate School, being administered by the Secretary of Agriculture;

(11) with respect to title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 relating to college housing, being administered by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development; and

(12) with respect to and being administered by the Director of the National Science Foundation, the Education Directorate.

(b) In any case where all of the functions of any agency or office are transferred pursuant to this Act, except any committee transferred under subsection (a) (3) of this section, such agency or office shall lapse.

(c) All officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, records, property, leases, obligations, and commitments and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, and other funds which the Director of the Office of Management and Budget determines are to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any office, agency, bureau, foundation, or function transferred under the provisions of this Act, are hereby transferred to the Department.

ADDITIONAL TRANSFERS

SEC. 8. The President is authorized to transfer to the Department of Education any other agency or instrumentality of the Federal Government which the President determines has functions relating to education and should be transferred to the Department of Education to promote efficiency in Government and to carry out the purposes of this Act. Such transfers shall incorporate, to the extent deemed desirable, the recommendations of the Federal Interagency Committee on Education as provided by section 12 (c) and shall be completed within one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act. A report describing such transfers shall be submitted to the Congress not later than thirty days thereafter.

TRANSFERRED PERSONNEL

SEC. 9. Each officer or employee of the United States or any department or agency thereof who is transferred at any time to the Department of Education shall be deemed, effective as of the date of such transfer, to be an officer or employee of the Department. No reappointment of any such officer or employee shall be required because of his transfer to that Department. Except as otherwise specifically provided by this section, no such officer or employee shall be reduced in rank, grade, seniority, or rate of compensation because of any such transfer.

PROVISIONS OF LAW APPLICABLE TO THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 10. Except to the extent inconsistent with this Act, all provisions of law applicable to the executive departments generally shall apply to the Department.

REDESIGNATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

SEC. 11. (a) The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is hereby redesignated the Department of Health and Welfare, and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is hereby redesignated the Secretary of Health and Welfare.

(b) Any reference to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare or the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare in any other law, rule, regulation, certificate, directive, instruction, license, or other official paper in force on the effective date of this Act shall be deemed to refer and apply to the Department of Health and Welfare and the Secretary of Health and Welfare, respectively.

FEDERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

SEC. 12. (a) There is hereby established a Federal Interagency Committee on Education (hereinafter referred to in this Act as the "Committee").

(b) The Committee shall study and make such recommendations as may be necessary to assure effective coordination of Federal programs affecting education, including—

(1) development of Federal programs in accordance with the educational goals and policies of the Nation;

(2) consistent administration of policies and practices among Federal agencies in the conduct of similar programs;

(3) full and effective communication among Federal agencies to avoid unnecessary duplication of activities with respect to education;

(4) adequate procedures for the availability of information on educational matters requested by the Secretary;

(5) recommendations for the improvement of Federal programs for the purpose of aiding students in their transition from school to work; and

(6) full and effective cooperation with the Secretary on such studies and analyses as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(c) The Committee shall, within 90 days of the enactment of this Act or the appointment and qualification of all Committee members, whichever is earlier, recommend to the President the transfer of such additional responsibilities as may be appropriate.

(d) The Committee shall be composed of the Secretary, who shall be the Chairperson, and one appropriate representative of each of the following agencies: The Department of State, the Department of Defense, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Labor, the Department of Health and Welfare (as redesignated by section 11 of this Act), the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the National Science Foundation, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The Committee shall also include the Chairpersons of the National Endowment for the Arts, and the National Endowment for the Humanities of the Department.

(e) The Chairperson may invite Federal agencies, in addition to the agencies which are represented on the Committee under the provisions of subsection (d) of this section, to designate representatives to participate in meetings of the Committee on matters of substantial interest to such agencies which are to be considered by the Committee.

(f) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairperson of the Council of Economic Advisers, and the Executive Director of the Domestic Council may each designate a staff member to attend meetings of the Committee as observers.

(g) The Committee shall meet at least six times in each year and shall prepare an annual report to the Secretary concerning its recommendations.

(h) Each Federal agency which is represented on the Committee under the provisions of subsection (d) of this section shall furnish necessary assistance to the Committee in accordance with section 214 of the Act of May 3, 1945 (31 U.S.C. 691).

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON EDUCATION

SEC. 13. (a) There is established a National Advisory Commission on Education (hereinafter referred to as the "National Commission") composed of fifteen members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among individuals—

(1) who have a demonstrated commitment, in public or private industries or organizations, for the enhancement and development of the educational needs and goals of the Nation;

(2) who have competence in assessing the progress of educational agencies, institutions, and organizations in meeting those needs and achieving those goals; and

(3) who are experienced with the policies or administration of State and local educational agencies and of institutions of higher education.

Members shall be appointed for terms of three years, except that (A) in the case of initially appointed members, as designated by the President, five members shall be appointed for terms of one year, five members shall be appointed for terms of two years, and five members shall be appointed for terms of three years, and (B) any member appointed to fill a vacancy shall serve the remainder of the term for which the member's predecessor was appointed.

(b) The National Commission shall—

(1) assist the Secretary in the formulation of Federal policy with respect to the appropriate role of the Federal Government in each action;

(2) review the administration of, general regulations for, and operation of Federal education programs;

(3) advise the Secretary and other Federal officials with respects to the educational needs and goals of the Nation and assess the progress of the renewal of appropriate agencies, institutions, and organizations of the Nation in order to meet those needs and achieve those goals;

(4) conduct objective evaluations of specific education programs and projects in order to ascertain the effectiveness of such programs and projects in achieving the purpose for which they are intended;

(5) make recommendations (including recommendations for changes in legislation) for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs;

(6) consult with Federal, State, and local and other education agencies, institutions, and organizations with respect to assessing education in the United States and the improvement of the quality of education, including—

(A) areas of unmet needs in education, national goals, and changing education priorities, and the means by which those areas may be met, developed, and achieved;

(B) specific means of improving the quality and effectiveness of teaching, curriculums, and educational media and of raising standards of scholarship and levels of achievement;

(7) conduct national conferences on the assessment, improvement, and renewal of education, in which national and regional education associations and organizations, State and local education officers and administrators, and other education-related organizations, institutions, and persons (including parents of children participating in Federal educational assistance programs) may exchange and disseminate information on the improvement of education;

(8) conduct, and report on, comparative studies and evaluations of education systems in foreign countries; and

(9) advise and assist in the coordination of all Federal educational advisory committees, councils or commissions.

(c) The National Commission shall make an annual report, and such other reports as it deems appropriate, to the President and to the Congress, concerning its findings, recommendations, and activities.

(d) In carrying out its responsibilities under this section, the National Commission shall take, together with the Secretary, whatever action is necessary to carry out section

448 of the General Education Provisions Act, to devise a manageable and effective advisory structure for the Department. The National Commission shall advise the Secretary on the number of advisory bodies that are necessary and the manner in which such bodies relate to one another. The National Commission shall consult with the National Advisory Council on the Education of Disadvantaged Children, the National Advisory Council on Education Professions Development, the National Council on Educational Research, and such other advisory councils and committees as may be appropriate to carry out its functions under this subsection. All Federal agencies are directed to cooperate with the National Commission in carrying out its functions under this subsection.

(e) The National Commission is authorized to procure such technical assistance as may be required to carry out its functions and the Secretary shall, in addition, make available to the National Commission such secretarial, clerical, and other assistance and such pertinent data prepared by the Department as the National Commission may require to carry out its functions.

(f) Members of the National Commission who are not in the regular full-time employ of the United States shall, while attending meetings or conferences of the National Commission or while otherwise engaged in the business of the National Commission, be entitled to receive compensation at a rate fixed by the Secretary, but not exceeding the rate specified at the time of such service for grade GS-18 under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime, and while so serving on the business of the National Commission away from their homes or regular places of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons employed intermittently in the Government service.

(g) The President shall nominate members to the National Commission not later than thirty days after the date of enactment of this Act.

OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL

SEC. 14. (a) As used in this section—

(1) the term "Inspector General" means the Inspector General of the Department;

(2) the term "Deputy" means the Deputy Inspector General of the Department; and

(3) the term "Federal agency" means an agency as defined in section 552(e) of title 5, United States Code, but shall not be construed to include the General Accounting Office.

(b) There is hereby established in the Department an Office of Inspector General.

(c) There shall be at the head of the Office an Inspector General who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, solely on the basis of integrity and demonstrated ability and without regard to political affiliation. The Inspector General shall report to and be under the general supervision of the Secretary or, to the extent such authority is delegated, the Under Secretary, but shall not be under the control of, or subject to supervision by, any other officer of the Department.

(d) There shall also be in the Office a Deputy Inspector General appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, solely on the basis of integrity and demonstrated ability and without regard to political affiliation. The Deputy shall assist the Inspector General in the administration of the Office and shall, during the absence or temporary incapacity of the Inspector General, or during a vacancy in that office, act as Inspector General.

(e) The Inspector General or the Deputy may be removed from office by the President. The President shall communicate the reasons for any such removal to both Houses of Congress.

(f) The Inspector General and the Deputy shall each be subject to the provisions of subchapter III of chapter 73, title 5, United States Code, notwithstanding any exemption from such provisions which might otherwise apply.

(g) It shall be the duty and responsibility of the Inspector General—

(1) to supervise, coordinate, and provide policy direction for auditing and investigative activities relating to programs and operations of the Department;

(2) to recommend policies for, and to conduct, supervise, or coordinate other activities carried out or financed by the Department for the purpose of promoting economy and efficiency in the administration of, or preventing and detecting fraud and abuse in, its programs and operations;

(3) to recommend policies for, and to conduct, supervise, or coordinate relationships between, the Department and other Federal agencies, State and local governmental agencies, and nongovernmental entities with respect to (A) all matters relating to the promotion of economy and efficiency in the administration of, or the prevention and detection of fraud and abuse in, programs and operations administered or financed by the Department, or (B) the identification and prosecution of participants in such fraud or abuse; and

(4) to keep the Secretary and the Congress fully and currently informed, by means of the reports required by subsection (i) and otherwise, concerning fraud and other serious problems, abuses, and deficiencies relating to the administration of programs and operations administered or financed by the Department, to recommend corrective action concerning such problems, abuses, and deficiencies, and to report on the progress made in implementing such corrective action.

(h) In carrying out the responsibilities specified in subsection (g)(1), the Inspector General shall have authority to approve or disapprove the use of outside auditors or to take other appropriate steps to insure the competence and independence of such auditors.

(i) In carrying out the duties and responsibilities provided by this section, the Inspector General shall give particular regard to the activities of the Comptroller General of the United States with a view to avoiding duplication and insuring effective coordination and cooperation.

(j) The Inspector General shall, not later than March 31 of each year, submit a report to the Secretary and to the Congress summarizing the activities of the Office during the preceding calendar year. Such report shall include, but need not be limited to—

(1) an identification and description of significant problems, abuses, and deficiencies relating to the administration of programs and operations of the Department disclosed by such activities;

(2) a description of recommendations for corrective action made by the Office with respect to significant problems, abuses, or deficiencies identified and described under paragraph (1);

(3) an evaluation of progress made in implementing recommendations described in the report or, where appropriate, in previous reports; and

(4) a summary of matters referred to prosecutive authorities and the extent to which prosecutions and convictions have resulted.

(k) The Inspector General shall make reports on a quarterly basis to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees or subcommittees of the Congress identifying any significant problems, abuses, or deficiencies concerning which the Office has made a recommendation for corrective action and on which, in the judgment of the Inspector General, adequate progress is not being made.

(l) The Inspector General shall report immediately to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees or subcommittees of the Congress whenever the Office becomes aware of particularly serious or flagrant problems, abuses, or deficiencies relating to the administration of programs and operations of the Department. The Deputy and Assistant Inspectors General shall have particular responsibility for informing the Inspector General of such problems, abuses, or deficiencies.

(m) The Inspector General (A) may make such additional investigations and reports relating to the administration of the programs and operations of the Department as are, in the judgment of the Inspector General, necessary or desirable, and (B) shall provide such additional information or documents as may be requested by either House of Congress or, with respect to matters within their jurisdiction, by any committee or subcommittee thereof.

(n) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the reports, information, or documents required by or under this section shall be transmitted to the Secretary and the Congress, or committees or subcommittees thereof, by the Inspector General without further clearance or approval. The Inspector General shall, insofar as feasible, provide copies of the reports required under subsections (j) and (k) to the Secretary sufficiently in advance of the due date for their submission to Congress to provide a reasonable opportunity for comments of the Secretary to be appended to the reports when submitted to Congress.

(o) In addition to the authority otherwise provided by this section, the Inspector General, in carrying out the provisions of this section, is authorized—

(1) to have access to all records, reports, audits, reviews, documents, papers, recommendations, or other material available to the Department which relate to programs and operations with respect to which the Inspector General has responsibilities under this section;

(2) to request such information or assistance as may be necessary for carrying out the duties and responsibilities provided by this section from any Federal, State, or local governmental agency or unit thereof;

(3) to require by subpena the production of all information, documents, reports, answers, records, accounts, papers, and other data and documentary evidence necessary in the performance of the functions assigned by this section, which subpena, in the case of contumacy or refusal to obey, shall be enforceable by order of any appropriate United States district court;

(4) to have direct and prompt access to the Secretary when necessary for any purpose pertaining to the performance of functions and responsibilities under this section;

(5) in the event that a budget request for the Office of Inspector General is reduced, before submission to Congress, to an extent which the Inspector General deems seriously detrimental to the adequate performance of the functions mandated by this section, the Inspector General shall so inform the Congress without delay;

(6) to select, appoint, and employ such officers and employees as may be necessary for carrying out the functions, powers, and duties of the Office subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates;

(7) to obtain services as authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, at daily rates not to exceed the equivalent rate prescribed for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule by section 5332 of title 5, United States Code;

(8) to the extent and in such amounts as may be provided in advance by appropriations Acts, to enter into contracts and other arrangements for audits, studies, analyses, and other services with public agencies and with private persons, and to make such payments as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

(p) (1) Upon request of the Inspector General for information or assistance under subsection (o) (2), the head of any Federal agency involved shall, insofar as is practicable, and not in contravention of any existing statutory restriction, or regulation of the Federal agency from which the information is requested, furnish to the Inspector General, or to an authorized designee, such information or assistance.

(2) Whenever information or assistance requested under subsection (o) (1) or (o) (2) is, in the judgment of the Inspector General, unreasonably refused or not provided, the Inspector General shall report the circumstances to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees or subcommittees of the Congress without delay.

(3) In the event any record or other information requested by the Inspector General under subsection (o) (1) or (o) (2) is not considered to be available under the provisions of section 552a (b) (1), (3), or (7) of title 5, United States Code, such record or information shall be available to the Inspector General in the same manner and to the same extent it would be available to the Comptroller General.

(q) The Secretary shall provide the Inspector General and his staff with appropriate and adequate office space at central and field office locations of the Department, together with such equipment, office supplies, and communications facilities and services as may be necessary for the operation of such offices, and shall provide necessary maintenance services for such offices and the equipment and facilities located therein.

(r)(1) The Inspector General shall receive compensation at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule by section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) The Deputy shall receive compensation at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule by section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

(s) There are hereby transferred to the Office of Inspector General the functions, powers, and duties of the Office of Inspector General in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare established under title II of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize conveyance of the interests of the United States in certain lands in Salt Lake County, Utah, to Shriners' Hospitals for Crippled Children, a Colorado corporation," approved October 15, 1976 (90 Stat. 2429) which the Director of the Office of Management and Budget determines to be principally involved in education.

(t) The personnel, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available or to be made available, of any office or agency the functions, powers, and duties of which are transferred under subsection (s) are hereby transferred to the Office of Inspector General.

(u) Personnel transferred pursuant to subsection (t) shall be transferred in accordance with applicable laws and regulations relating to the transfer of functions except that classification and compensation of such personnel shall not be reduced for one year after such transfer.

(v) In any case where all functions, powers, and duties of any office or agency are transferred pursuant to this subsection, such office or agency shall lapse. Any person who, on the effective date of this section, held a position compensated in accordance with the Executive Schedule, and who, without a break in service, is appointed in the Office to a position having duties comparable to those performed immediately preceding such appointment shall continue to be compensated in the new position at not less than the rate provided for the previous position, for the duration of service in the new position.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 15. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges—

(1) which have been issued, made, granted, or allowed to become effective in the exercise of functions which are transferred under this Act, by (A) any agency or office or part thereof, any functions of which are transferred by this Act, or (B) any court of competent jurisdiction, and

(2) which are in effect at the time this Act takes effect, shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or repealed by the Secretary of Education by any court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(b) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceedings pending at the time this section takes effect before any agency or office, or part thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings, to the extent that they relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued before the Department of Education. Such proceedings, to the extent they do not relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued before the agency or office, or part thereof, before which they were pending at the time of such transfer. In either case orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or repealed by the Secretary of Education, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(A) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the date this section takes effect, and

(B) in all such suits proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered, in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in the officer's official capacity as an officer of any agency or office, or part thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any agency or office, or part thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in the officer's official capacity shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. Causes of actions, suits, or other proceedings may be asserted by or against the United States or such official of the Department of Education as may be appropriate and, in any litigation pending when this section takes effect, the court may at any time, on its own motion or that of any party, enter an order which will give effect to the provisions of this subsection.

(2) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any agency or office, or officer thereof in the officer's official capacity, is a party to a suit, and under this Act—

(A) such agency or office, or any part thereof, is transferred to the Secretary of Education,

(B) any function of such agency, office, or part thereof; or officer is transferred to the Secretary of Education, then such suit shall be continued by the Secretary of Education (except in the case of a suit not involving functions transferred to the Secretary of Education in which case the suit shall be continued by the agency, office, or part thereof, or officer which was a party to the suit prior to the effective date of this Act).

(d) With respect to any function transferred by this Act and exercised after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any agency, office, or part thereof, or officer so transferred or functions of which are so transferred shall be deemed to mean the department or officer in which such function is vested pursuant to this Act.

(e) Orders and actions of the Secretary of Education in the exercise of functions transferred under this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions had been by the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions, immediately preceding their transfer, action upon the record, ments relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Secretary.

(f) In the exercise of the functions transferred under this Act, the Secretary shall have the same authority as that vested in the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions immediately preceding their transfer, and the Secretary's actions in exercising such functions shall have the same force and effect as when exercised by such agency or office, or part thereof.

(g) The Secretary, in addition to the authority to delegate and redelegate contained in any other Act in the exercise of the functions transferred in this Act to the Secretary may delegate any of such functions to such officers and employees of the Department, as the Secretary may designate, may authorize such successive redelegations of such functions as the Secretary may deem appropriate and may make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out functions of the Secretary.

Sec. 10. (a) The Secretary is authorized to establish a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interest of economy and efficiency in the Department including such services as a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its agencies; central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services; office space, central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and a central library service. The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing capital (which appropriations are hereby authorized) and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less the related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such fund shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of agencies and offices in the Department or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates which will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payment for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus found in the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses) considered above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund.

(b) In addition to the authority contained in any other Act which is transferred to and vested in the Secretary as necessary, and when not otherwise available, the Secretary is authorized to provide for, construct, or maintain the following for employees and their dependents stationed at remote localities:

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) motion picture equipment and film for recreation and training; and

(4) living and working quarters and facilities.

The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary and the proceeds therefrom shall be credited to the appropriation from which the expenditure was made.

(c) (1) The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts and bequests of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts and bequests of money and the proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts or advantaged, rural, and urban education, and progress made toward the continuing renewal of education; the results and outcomes of education and schooling, including the overall results on generally recognized standard examinations for entrance to undergraduate and graduate institutions; budget projections for five years based on actual or anticipated appropriations for the fiscal year in which the annual report is issued; recommendations as to the improvement of programs for the handicapped, recommendations with respect to the advisory structure of the Department, including the names and composition of advisory committees and councils and the relationships the committees and councils bear to one another and recommendations as to the elimination of overlapping advisory committees and similar data.

CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 18. (a) Section 19(d)(1) of title 3, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare"; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "Secretary of Health and Welfare, Secretary of Education".

(b) Section 101 of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1978

AUGUST 9 (legislative day, May 17), 1978.—Ordered to be printed

Mr. RIBICOFF, from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, submitted the following

REPORT

ADDITIONAL VIEWS

[To accompany S. 991]

The Committee on Governmental Affairs, to which was referred the bill S. 991 to establish a Department of Education in the executive branch, and for other purposes, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and recommends that the bill, as amended, do pass.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The basic purpose of S. 991 is to provide for the establishment of a Federal Department of Education. Today, there are more than 300 separate Federal education programs involving expenditures reaching nearly $25 billion. The Federal presence in education is substantial. Over 40 Federal departments and agencies are involved in education grants, services, and regulations.

The late Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, in discussing the need for a Department of Education noted last year;

> It is necessary to have a more efficient mechanism for the coordination of these numerous programs in a sensible, workable, and effective framework.

The purpose of S. 991 is to structure the Federal education effort in such a way that Federal education programs are able to adapt to the changing needs of the nation. S. 991 provides a mechanism for the large array of Federal programs to be effectively coordinated. Its development reflects the following:

> Education is important to the total learning population—it is a continuing process and includes lifelong and noninstitutional learning.
> The Federal education effort should enhance the ability of public and nonpublic organizations as well as State and local education agencies to improve the quality of education and equality of access for all individuals.
> The Federal education effort should be designed to help meet the future educational needs of our Nation.

The purpose of the bill is to make the Federal education effort more effective and coordinated.

Education in the United States has traditionally been a function of State and local governments and private institutions. Over the past 25 years, education has commanded the largest single share of State and local governmental expenditures—38 percent. The delivery of edu- institutions. The intention of S. 991 is to preserve this prerogative. There is a need to insure that the Federal presence in education should be supportive, helpful and effective. Not only would the Department of Education increase the visibility and attention given to education needs at the Federal level, but it is designed to increase the participation of families, communities, public and private schools, and state and local governments in this process.

The Department is thus designed around the following purposes:

(1) To insure that education receives appropriate emphasis at the Federal level. By creating a Cabinet Department of Education, effective management, coordination, and leadership in Federal programs can be substantially improved. The relatively low bureaucratic status of the Office of Education means that education receives less attention from the Cabinet and the President. The large number of existing Federal education programs has created management problems at the Federal, State, local, and institutional levels. The scattering of programs across Federal agencies has resulted in poor coordination in addition to multiple, duplicative and even conflicting regulations. Fragmentation at the Federal level has led to piecemeal approaches to education and education-related problems.

(2) To assist the Federal effort in coordinating education activities and programs through interagency cooperation, technical assistance, and evaluation of program effectiveness.

The Secretary will be responsible for education programs within the Department. Additionally, the Secretary will head the Federal Interagency Committee on Education which would insure close coordination of Federal education activities to facilitate the resolution of common problems and promote effective planning and management of such activities.

In addition, the Secretary will provide technical assistance to education programs of other Federal departments and evaluate the effectiveness of education programs.

(3) To continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to insuring access to equal education opportunities. Equal educational opportunity has been and must remain a major educational goal of the Federal Government.

The Federal Government has acted to insure equality of educational opportunity for every American regardless of race, sex, age, ethnic heritage, economic disadvantage, or handicapping condition:

Racial minorities.—Through compliance efforts, technical assistance, and financial assistance the Federal Government has promoted racial desegregation.

Handicapped.—Through Public Law 94–142 (the Education for All Handicapped Children Act) and section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1972, the handicapped are guaranteed an appropriate education.

Language minorities.—Several Federal programs help to deal with the problems of children with limited English language skills.

Women.—Several Federal programs, and statutes such as the Women's Educational Equity Act, and title IX of the 1972 education amendments, are designed to help end sex discrimination.

Compensatory education.—Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act has provided compensatory education for the economically disadvantaged.

Access to higher education.—The Higher Education Amendments of 1972 began to give students from low-income families access to higher education.

Native Americans.—A number of Federal programs in the Office of Education and Bureau of Indian Affairs make it possible for Indians, Alaska Natives, and Aleuts to receive adequate education services.

Migrant children.—The Federal Government provides a variety of services for migrant children.

As a result ofthese and other Federal initiatives—increased access to postsecondary education, bilingual education, and the education of all handicapped children—schools and colleges have dramatically increased their efforts to meet the educational needs of children and youth, particularly those from poor families and minority backgrounds.

S. 991 insures the continuation and strengthening of the Federal commitment to insuring equal educational opportunities for every individual regardless of race, sex, age, ethnicity, economic disadvantage, or handicapping condition. In conjunction with this responsibility, it establishes an Office for Civil Rights whose director would report directly to the Secretary. To emphasize the importance of civil rights compliance, the director's position is upgraded from the present GS–18 level to an executive level IV.

(4) to supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private, public, and nonpublic institutions, education research institutions, community organizations, and parents and students to improve quality of education.

S. 991 recognizes that Federal education policies should be founded on the recognition that Federal, State, and local governments, tribal governments, public and nonpublic institutions, communities, parents, and students must be participants in the Federal education process.

The bill establishes an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council would conduct studies and make recommendations to the Secretary and to the President and, where appropriate, to the Congress for improving the intergovernmental system for developing and carrying out educational policies.

The Council is designed to supplement and complement State and local efforts to meet the Nation's education needs.

Assigned within the Department is a level IV officer to perform intergovernmental policy and relations functions. The officer would have responsibility for assuring that Federal education policies are supportive of the various interests involved in the intergovernmental process.

(5) To encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the decisionmaking process, including the development and improvement of education programs and services.

A higher level of citizen participation in the education decisionmaking process will serve to substantially increase public confidence in our educational system.

S. 991 recognizes the need for increased citizen involvement by providing for an effective structure to insure citizen, parent, and student participation in educational programs and to monitor such participation in programs where it is required by law.

(6) To assist in promoting improvements in the quality of American education in basic skill development, educational excellence, and lifelong learning opportunities.

The importance of education to the American people remains high. Yet, at the same time, concern over the lack of quality education is more and more evident. This is demonstrated by concern over declining student achievement, as measured by scholastic aptitude tests and decreased public confidence in the quality of education.

The bill provides a structure to assist in promoting the quality of and the relevance of education to individual needs, including the assurance of an adequate level of skill development and lifelong learning opportunities. It specifically provides for assistant secretaries for the major education functions to be performed by the Department—these include the areas of Indian education, education and training programs for the handicapped, child nutrition, elementary and secondary education, postsecondary education, occupational, adult and community education, and research and improvement.

(7) To broaden the approaches to meeting educational needs by increasing dialogue among schools, parents, communities, the work place, the home, and other related institutions.

There is a need for a wide diversity of approaches to education. Although the school has been traditionally the classroom, other more diverse methods of achieving educational experiences are emerging. More services provided by community and private institutions fill the gap the schools fail to address. Increased rates of high school dropouts and unemployed youth are symptomatic of the need for more diversity in education approaches for youth. There is an increasing need for parents to become more involved in their children's education. The wide range of other services offered to children within the school setting are important for achieving the total educational development of the child. Such factors as health and nutrition are important components of the school setting.

S. 991 provides a structure for improving the relationships between education and work, through such programs as vocational and career education and related training programs. It creates an Office for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education headed by an Assistant Secretary, which can serve as the link between the wide array of educational services offered the individual in the workplace and community.

The relationships among parents, schools, business, labor, and communities will be strengthened by such programs as community schools and adult education, which would be administered by this Office.

(8) To provide assistance in the area of research relating to human development, and learning systems that complement education; and to share findings with State, local, and tribal officials public and nonpublic institutions, community organizations, parents, and students.

The bill establishes an Office of Educational Research and Improvement, headed by an Assistant Secretary which would have the responsibility over a wide range of research programs administered by the Department.

With the establishment of this Office, the committee recognizes the need to focus more directly on the Federal Government's efforts to provide help and support of research, development, dissemination, demonstration, and training activities associated with a wide spectrum of educational research activities. These activities include science education, the improvement of quality teaching and the advancement of learning, and the improved development and utilization of programs and facilities associated with technology and telecommunications delivery systems.

(9) To improve the design and management of education and related programs by simplifying Federal procedures and administrative structures and by eliminating unnecessary and duplicative burdens, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds.

The bill assures that the Federal role supplements and complements the efforts of State, local, tribal, and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated needs of those agencies.

The Department will be responsible for reducing Federal program and reporting requirements to assist the activities of State and local governments and public and nonpublic education agencies.

(10) To establish mechanisms where educational institutions may bring their problems to the attention of appropriate departments and make recommendations to insure the continuing vitality of such institutions. Postsecondary education has become more diverse. Between 1975 and 1978 over 22 million people were enrolled in postsecondary courses and 11.3 million students participated in higher education. Public and private institutions at all levels have been increasing. S. 991 requires the Secretary to assess the contributions of educational institutions and to study ways of insuring their continued vitality as well as their adapting roles to society's changing needs.

It is the committee's intention that in the creation of the Department, that the rights of State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions shall be maintained and protected in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, and selection of curricula and program content.

The Need for a Department of Education

Having concluded 1½ years' consideration, including 10 days of hearings and testimony from more than 100 witnesses, the committee believes there is a strong need for the creation of a separate, Cabinet-level Department of Education in the Federal Government.

Generally, the committee finds that:

> The low status of education in the Federal Government does not give rightful recognition to education as an important, fundamental national activity;
> The Federal Government is not now adequately prepared, in either structural or administrative terms, to assist American education in dealing forthrightly with today's tremendous educational challenges and problems;
> The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has serious institutional weaknesses and deficiencies which require such a major reorganization change—the creation of an education agency separate from HEW;
> The scattering and fragmentation of Federal education programs produces burdensome, duplicative, and time-consuming paperwork and regulations; and
> There exists today no one high-level, visible, or accountable official in the Federal Government who is concerned with education and who has the ability to effectively coordinate the hundreds of education programs at the national level.

EDUCATION IS IMPORTANT TO THE NATION

The process of education is basic to our society and to the proper functioning of democratic government. When the people are responsible for making decisions affecting their entire society, they must be sufficiently educated to make informed decisions. Democracy depends for its very existence on a highly educated citizenry. And, because the people are involved in decisionmaking at all levels of government in the United States, education is and should be of vital concern to Federal, State, and local governments.

Education has always been an important aspect of our lives. Since the beginning of time, few nations have stressed the importance of education as much as the United States. Few nations, until more recent times, have achieved the near total rates of participation in the educational system that America has achieved. Education in the United States is universally available. Every American citizen is required by law to attend school.

Traditionally, the American people have held a confirmed belief and respect for education as the path upward. A recent Harris Poll last year showed 90 percent of the public felt "achieving quality education for children" was very important. Another survey revealed at least 75 percent of the American people still believe a "free, unlimited education" will be a major contributor to America's greatness in the future.

Education is a major function that involves more people than any other. More than 50 million persons—fully one-quarter of the population—are directly involved in education.

The American people invest more money in education than in our national defense. Total education spending in the United States today exceeds $150 billion—nearly 10 percent of the gross national product.

For State and local governments, education is the single largest expenditure. States and localities are now spending almost 40 percent of their annual budgets to pay for the cost of public education.

Despite problems and crises brought on by our ever-changing society and technology, Americans continue to seek more education to cope with an uncertain future. The facts show this trend clearly:

Half of all children 3 to 5 years of age are now enrolled in preschool programs;

Nearly 80 percent of all 17-year-olds now complete high school, compared with 50 percent in 1940; and

Enrollment in institutions of higher education has jumped from 3.8 million in 1960 to more than 11 million today.

While the responsibility for educational policies and curricula must continue to reside with States, localities, and private institutions, there is a legitimate Federal interest, and a defined role, in education. Presently, there are important programs which the Federal government does carry out in the field of education:

Guaranteeing equal access to education;

Providing assistance for educating the handicapped or disadvantaged;

Conducting comprehensive research into new ideas or trends or problems in education;

Providing valuable complementary financial assistance to States and localities so as to insure the people are receiving a quality education; and

Maintaining significant higher education loan and grant programs to open doors for all students desiring to continue their education beyond public school.

The committee believes the improvement of the Federal education effort must be a major priority. But education will never be a priority as long as it is smothered in layers of bureaucracy, fragmented across several Federal agencies, and diminished by a severe lack of attention in our National Government.

The importance of education to the success of our country will continue to grow.

THE TROUBLED STATE OF AMERICAN EDUCATION

The committee's consideration of the issue of whether to establish a separate Department of Education comes at a time when the problems in education have reached near-crisis proportions.

While Americans continue to strongly believe in education as the key to success and fulfillment, their confidence in the present capabilities of our educational institutions is down sharply. A recent Gallup Poll found 60 percent of the American people feel the quality of education in our schools is declining.

This low level of confidence stems from a variety of sources. Perhaps most disturbing was the revelation last year by the College Entrance Examination Board that overall scores on the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) showed a long, significant decline from 1967 through 1977. In effect, the report said our students were leaving public schools with deficiencies in basic skills. A subsequent college board study, conducted by Willard Wirtz, noted:

> More and more high school graduates show up in college classrooms and employers' personnel offices with barely a speaking acquaintance with the English language and no writing facility at all.

Recent Federal studies have shown students are becoming increasingly disillusioned with their public schools, and as a result, absenteeism is on the rise. Educators are trying to institute a wide variety of different tactics to either lure students back to school, or penalize them for being unnecessarily absent.

A perplexing problem for school officials is reconciling the situation of declining enrollments and increasing costs. As the birth rate in the U.S. continues its steady downtrend, inflation has driven up the cost of education. Instead of being able to save money where fewer students are attending school, a local school district today is actually paying more than before.

The American taxpayer is rebelling against rising property taxes, which are used predominantly in the United States to finance public education. States and localities spend approximately 40 percent of their budgets for education.

While a Department of Education in and of itself could not solve education's tremendous problems, its primary purpose will be to supplement and complement States, localities and private institutions. The Nation's education officials will be hindered in their performance by an ill-equipped, fragmented, and confusing Federal education structure. The Federal Government should assist States and localities in providing a good education for all.

The Committee believes the troubled state of education in our country today would be better aided by the creation of a Department of Education.

HEW'S INSTITUTIONAL DEFECTS

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is the largest Cabinet department in the Federal Government. Its budget will rise to $180 billion this year—more than one-third of the entire Federal budget.

HEW's more than 325 programs inevitably touch nearly every living American. Social security, medicare, medicaid, aid to families with dependent children, and a host of other comprehensive programs serve most of the Nation's 220 million citizens. They are all vital to the daily survival of many people. HEW's mandate to safeguard the health and welfare of the American people is an awesome responsibility.

But HEW also has important responsibilities in the field of education. In its examination of the history of HEW, the Committee has found education is often the victim of neglect and of poor interdepartmental competition with massive health and welfare programs.

HEW's size alone causes serious institutional weaknesses which cannot be remedied through any amount of in-house reorganization.

In the last 20 years, the Federal Government's role in health and welfare has expanded 10 times faster than that of education. Out of HEW's $180 billion budget, at least $168 billion will be expended for health and welfare. The remaining $12 billion makes up the budget of the Education Division. Thus, education issues are dominated by health and welfare concerns.

The committee believes, however, the creation of a Department of Education will not result in any dramatic or unusual increases in education spending. On the contrary, the Congress will be better able to clearly evaluate and assess potential education budget allotments on their own merits.

Putting health, education, and welfare together in one Cabinet department in order to develop a comprehensive human services approach in government has not worked in the past at HEW. The facts indicate it will not work in the future. No other country in the world places these three components together in one governmental agency.

In testimony before the committee, Education Division employees said they rarely conduct discussions or even have contact with the other 150,000 employees who work for HEW. Most of the six former U.S. Commissioners of Education who testified before the committee in October 1977 agreed they were involved more in coordination with those education programs outside HEW, such as the school lunch programs in USDA or the CETA programs in the Labor Department. Rufus Miles, Jr., Princeton University professor and former director of HEW administration for more than 12 years, told the committee:

> In all my years at HEW, I never saw any significant coordination of programs and functions between the Office of Education and the other components of HEW. This coordination * * * is simply a figment of the imagination.

Former HEW Secretaries have all been invariably, men of high caliber, great intellect, and boundless energy. But HEW's responsibilities in health and welfare are so extensive that the HEW Secretary simply does not have sufficient time to devote to education. President Carter recently surprised the nation by observing the Cabinet official who discussed education with him most was the Attorney General.

The committee thus finds that the overall mission of HEW has changed so substantially since its formation 25 years ago that education is almost "out of place" in that Department. Education is operating separately and distinctly from health and welfare, and benefits little from nonexistent "linkages" to them.

The committee believes by the creation of a separate Department of Education, the administration of, and attention given to, health, education and welfare will improve significantly. Our Nation's health and welfare programs are also important and should not be neglected. By establishing an Education Department, we would be lifting another burden off the back of the HEW Secretary, thereby leaving him or her more time to devote to important health and welfare services.

The creation of a Department of Education is a sound administrative and managerial move. It is important to point out the American Society for Public Administration, for the first time in its history, has endorsed the creation of a Cabinet department—the Department of Education:

> The addition of another Cabinet department would not unduly stretch the President's span of major organizational control. On the other hand, coordination of educational programs to minimize unnecessary administrative burdens and expense for educational institutions and to rationalize inconsistent educational policies would be facilitated if a Cabinet official were given this as a major assignment.

But, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is not capable of achieving this coordination, because he or she is institutionally restrained in the difficult assignment of coping with health and welfare matters, as well.

THE SCATTERED, FRAGMENTED FEDERAL EDUCATION EFFORT

This year, the Federal Government will spend more than $25 billion on education in one form or another. But this considerable sum comes from over 300 different programs which are scattered among nearly 40 different Federal agencies.

The fragmentation of Federal education programs means there are many voices in Washington speaking for education. There is no one official out front to take the lead, to have the authority to achieve meaningful coordination of our education effort.

The committee believes there must be effective coordination of this myriad of education programs. There should be one, high-level official who is assigned the task of overseeing the Federal education effort to prevent duplication and inefficiency. Creation of a Department of Education, with a Cabinet Secretary as its head, will go a long way toward achieving this badly needed coordination.

Fragmentation's most harmful attribute is the inordinate amount of burdensome, time-consuming, and duplicate paperwork and regulations. For example, most schools qualify for aid from both the U.S. Office of Education and the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The child nutrition and school lunch programs in USDA have data and accounting requirements, funding cycles, compliance procedures, and eligibility standards which all differ from those of the programs in OE. The result of this sort of fragmentation, according to the Council of Chief State School Officers, is that States and localities are finding themselves spending nearly 40 percent of their time filling out reports for the Federal Government—which gives out only 8 percent of all education costs. One State superintendent, Dr. Joseph Cronin of Illinois, told the committee his office of education employs 20 individuals—at an average salary of $15,000 annually—just to assist in the preparation and presentation of Federal reports.

With 40 different Federal agencies involved substantially in education, the situation today is one where each agency is promulgating its own rules, its own regulations, and its own paperwork requirements. There is inevitably some overlap and duplication.

S. 991, as reported by the committee, will achieve a significant amount of consolidation of widely scattered Federal education programs. Altogether, more than 170 programs will be included in the new Department. The committee strongly believes such a broadly based Department of Education will greatly enhance chances for beneficial reductions in paperwork and regulations, and in overhead costs for States and localities.

While the Department of Education will represent an important step towards consolidation of Federal education services, another 100 education programs will continue to exist in other agencies, mainly because their missions are integrally related to the functions of the agencies in which they reside. Yet coordination between these programs and those of the Education Department will continue to be important.

The Federal Interagency Committee on Education, (FICE), could serve as a useful tool for the Secretary of Education in his or her coordination efforts. To date, the successes of FICE have been few. The Committee was originally authorized by an executive order issued by President Johnson in 1964. Clearly, the problem with FICE has been its low-level status. Federal departments and agencies have often designated representatives to the FICE who rank well below policy level.

But under the new Department of Education, FICE would be headed by the Secretary, and other Federal agencies would be specifically required to appoint high-ranking officials to the Committee. This elevation will insure more effective coordination by placing it at higher levels where the decisions are made.

By consolidating education programs, reducing paperwork and red-tape, and improving coordination between agencies, the Department of Education will make great inroads in remedying a confusing and fragmented Federal education effort.

THE IMPORTANCE OF CABINET STATUS FOR EDUCATION

Improved management of Federal education programs is needed within the Federal Government now more than ever. HEW's institutional deficiencies have thwarted it for too long. The present crisis-like problems in education demand it. And fragmented Federal education programs have gotten out of hand.

Congress and the American people need a highly visible, responsible, high-level Federal official who can be held accountable for the successes or failures of educational programs and policies on the Federal level.

Education needs a strong advocate in Washington to speak for its needs and to assist in solving its problems.

But effective management does not mean "more control." The responsibility for education policy and curriculum will remain at State, local and private levels. Instead, better management by a Secretary of Education means improved accountability, coordination, and advocacy. Each of these is important if the Federal Government is to make a helpful contribution in assisting American education. The committee believes a Department of Education can provide valuable and precious assistant to States, localities, and private institutions without infringing on their constitutional right to determine their individual educational needs and policies.

As the Federal education effort continues to expand, and the pressures on education continue to mount, the importance of Cabinet status for education becomes clearer. Presidential involvement increases. For too long, American Presidents have had difficulty becoming involved in assisting education programs at the Federal level. Most of them have had little contact with their education officials.

The position of U.S. Commissioner of Education is such a frustrating job that sometimes the most capable and qualified individuals are not attracted to it. In the last 12 years, testimony presented by Dr. Samuel Halperin cited the fact that the commissionership has changed hands 13 different times. It is a revolving door that turns rapidly. The Commissioner has little advocacy in the system. He is afforded almost no opportunity for policy input. His decisions and recommendations on education budgets are usually overruled. The Commissioner of Education is buried in the HEW bureaucracy. He rarely sees the HEW Secretary, much less any other high-level official.

In 1972, Congress attempted to elevate the status of education in HEW by establishing the post of Assistant Secretary for Education in the Department. Although Congress made the Assistant Secretary the head of education, little in the way of responsibility was assigned the new official. Most programs remained under the purview of the Commissioner. Today, education responsibilities with HEW are seriously fragmented between a Commissioner and an Assistant Secretary.

Who heads the HEW Education Division? There is no clear answer. In testimony before the committee, Barbara Kemp, president of the union representing the Education Division employees, said the confusion has reached the point where employees, if they want to resign, now address their letters, "To Whom It May Concern."

Through the creation of the Department of Education, the problem of fragmented leadership within HEW would be corrected immediately. For the first time in nearly a decade, education programs would be administered from a clearly ordered, well-organized structure.

The Secretary of Education would clearly be the Federal official for education. Lines of authority and of responsibility within the Federal education structure would be defined. People there would know to whom they report. Administratively, the change would be a significant improvement over the existing situation.

Cabinet officers carry weight in Washington. They can bring problems to light easily. They can bring to the attention of Congress and of the President education matters which are ever changing.

Cabinet status enables the Secretary to better coordinate Federal education programs.

Cabinet status is a step toward increasing administrative efficiency—both for education and health and welfare.

And, giving education Cabinet status will attract more qualified persons to serve in education programs where before others have been turned away by the frustrations of the jobs.

Education deserves to become the 13th member of the President's Cabinet.

HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

Efforts to create a Cabinet-level Department of Education in the Federal Government have been ongoing, often sporadically, for the past 125 years.

In March 1867, Congress created a non-Cabinet Department of Education, primarily to collect statistics and other relevant data on the condition of American education. Unfortunately, this non-Cabinet agency never really got off the ground. Its budget was less than $15,000. It had less than 10 clerks and existed for only slightly more than 1 year. The Department was subsequently given bureau status and placed within the Department of the Interior for the next 70 years.

In 1939, the U.S. Office of Education was transferred from the Interior Department to the new Federal Security Agency created by President Franklin Roosevelt.

The Office of Education has remained in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare since its creation in 1953 under the Eisenhower administration.

From 1908 through 1951, more than 50 pieces of legislation to establish a separate, Cabinet-level Department of Education were introduced in Congress. In that time period, nearly 20 days of hearings were held on several bills, and at least six were actually reported to either the House or the Senate floor for final consideration. No action, however, was ever taken beyond the committee stage.

Yet, education advocates gave much effort and consideration in the first half of the 20th century to the creation of a separate Education Department. As far back as February 1910, then U.S. Commissioner of Education Elmor Brown, in testimony before a congressional committee on the issue, predicted:

> A time will be reached when the erection of such a department of the Government as this measure contemplates will be necessary to good administration.

In a December 1923 message to Congress, President Calvin Coolidge gave his support to the concept of the separate Department:

> Having in mind that education is peculiarly a local problem, and that it should always be pursued with the largest freedom of choice by students and parents, nevertheless, the Federal Government might well give the benefit of its counsel and encouragement more freely in this direction. I do consider it a fundamental requirement of national activity which is worthy of a separate department and a place in the Cabinet.

And in 1931, the National Advisory Committee on Education recommended the creation of a Cabinet Department of Education:

> No bureau chief or head of a detached or independent establishment can give the equal access to the Chief Executive and that equality of approach to the heads of all departments concerned essential to the effective total operation of education of education in government. The presence in the government of an officer of cabinet rank would insure that effective contribution of education which is essential to the future political and social welfare of the nation.

The Federal effort in education continued to grow dramatically after the creation of HEW in 1953. The budget for the Office of Education jumped from approximately $400 million then, to $4 billion during President Johnson's Great Society initiatives, to more than $10 billion today.

And as the Federal effort increased, so did calls in Congress for the creation of an Education Department separate from HEW. From 1953 to the present, more than 80 pieces of legislation were introduced in Congress and a large number of authoritative studies were conducted.

Under the Johnson administration, three separate task forces seriously studied the concept of a Cabinet Department of Education. The 1964 Task Force on Government Reorganization favored an Education Department:

> Because the schools have been afraid of Federal domination, the Government has never had a comprehensive policy for the advancement of education and research. But it is unrealistic to think we can protect the freedom of education by pretending to ignore it.

Also in 1964, a study team headed by then HEW Secretary John Gardner was split between creating an independent Office of Education at the Presidential level and creating a Cabinet department. Still another group, the Heineman task force, concluded in 1967 that a Department of Education was not necessary at that time.

Much attention was focused on the introduction of S. 100 (the Department of Education Act) in January 1965 by Senator Ribicoff. A former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Senator Ribicoff said a Department of Education was necessary because education was not receiving the attention it deserved in the burgeoning and increasingly unmanageable HEW Department. The Ribicoff bill has been reintroduced in every Congress since then.

The 1970's brought a renewed interest in the establishment of a Cabinet-level Department of Education. In the 1972 Presidential campaign, the Democratic candidate, Senator George McGovern, announced his support for giving education Cabinet status. In 1976, the Ford Foundation and the American Council on Education sponsored a landmark study on the issue, authored by Rufus Miles, Jr., formerly HEW director of administration throughout the 1960's. The Miles study gave strong backing to the creation of a Department of Education.

President Carter, throughout his 1976 campaign for the Presidency, pledged that in his proposed reorganization of the Federal Government, he would create a Department of Education.

In March 1977, Senator Ribicoff again introduced his legislation. This time, however, more than half of the members of the U.S. Senate joined him in cosponsoring the bill, S. 991. In the U.S. House of Representatives, nearly 30 different pieces of legislation to create a separate Department were also introduced in the 95th Congress.

Upon taking office, President Carter set up the President's reorganization project to study the Federal Government structure and recommend reorganization proposals. The project's education study team began work in April 1977. In late November 1977, they presented to the President for his review three options: (1) The creation of a Department of Education; (2) the creation of a Department of Education and Human Development; and (3) an uplifting of the status of the Education Division within HEW. The President decided in favor of the establishment of an Education Department, and announced his decision in his state of the Union address in January 1978.

Meanwhile, the Committee on Governmental Affairs opened the first congressional hearings on Department of Education legislation in nearly 25 years. On October 12 and 13, 1977, prominent academic authorities, major national education organizations, and six former U.S. Commissioners of Education testified on the need for the Department.

The committee devoted 10 days of hearings to S. 991 and heard testimony from more than 100 witnesses. Committee markups on S. 991 were held July 11, 14, and 18, 1978. S. 991, the Department of Education Organization Act, was unanimously ordered reported by the committee for full Senate consideration.

TITLE I

Title I states the purposes for creating the Department of Education and the congressional findings.

Some of the congressional findings are: Education is fundamental to individual development and national growth; there is a need to insure equal educational opportunity; the primary responsibility of education is that of State, local, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic institutions, families, and communities; the proliferation of Federal programs has created management problems at the Feedral, State, local, and institutional levels; there is a need to improve the quality of education; and the existing structure of the executive branch does not recognize adequately the importance of education.

Some of the purposes of the Department are: To insure education receives the appropriate emphasis at the Federal levels; to provide leadership to Federal efforts to improve quality and access to education; to continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to equal educational opportunity; to supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public, and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents, and students to improve the quality of education, while acknowledging the right of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions to formulate policies, choose curriculums, decide administrative questions, and choose program content with respect to their educational programs; to encourage parental, student, and community involvement; to promote the quality and relevance of education to individual needs, including basic skills and lifelong learning; to broaden the approaches to meeting educational needs by strengthening relationships among schools, parents, students, communities, the workplace, and other institutions; to improve and simplify the design and management of education programs and eliminating unnecessary constraints, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds; and to assess the potential contribution of higher education institutions to improving national education goals. The bill further states it is the intention of Congress to protect the rights of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, and selection of curriculums and program content.

TITLE II

Title II establishes the Department. It provides for the offices and the officers which administer them. It provides for a Secretary and an Under Secretary. It also provides for the following offices which are headed and administered by Assistant Secretaries carrying the same titles: Office of Indian Education; Office of Child Nutrition; Office of Elementary and Secondary Education; Office of Post Secondary Education; Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education; Office of Educational Research and Improvement; and Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. There is also established in this section an Office for Civil Rights, to be administered by a Director (appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate), an Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children, to be administered by an Administrator, and three additional officers (two executive level IV Assistant Secretary positions and one level V position) to perform staff functions. These functions would include: Intergovernmental policies and relations, public information; planning, evaluation, and policy development; congressional relations; administration and management; and public, parent, and student involvement.

Each Assistant Secretary and the Director of the Office for Civil Rights would be compensated at the rate provided for executive level IV. The Administrator of the Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children and the additional officer who is not an Assistant Secretary would be compensated at the rate provided for executive level V.

Of the staff functions to be performed by the three additional officers, intergovernmental policies and relations would be performed by one of the level IV Assistant Secretaries and the planning, evaluation, and policy functions would be performed by the other level IV position, in addition to any other duties the Secretary may assign.

This title also provides for an Inspector General, to have the same responsibilities and independence as HEW's Inspector General, and a General Counsel. Each of these officers would be executive level IV's.

The Director of the Office for Civil Rights would be required to submit an annual report to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress on the enforcement and compliance of education-related civil rights laws.

With regard to the Office of Indian Education, the eligibility requirements would not be altered or eliminated for participation in programs previously administered by the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of the Interior. The trust responsibility of the United States for Indians, Alaskan Natives, or Aleuts would not be altered in any way. The actual operation of the schools would be phased in over a 3-year period.

This title also provides for the establishment of an Intergovernmental Advisory Council. The Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education would provide a forum for the development of intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education; make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs and education-related programs; promote better intergovernmental relations; and assess Federal policies and make recommendations to insure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation, by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

The Council would be composed of 22 members to be appointed by the President. In making appointments, the President would consult with such groups as the National Governor's Conference, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, and the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

Lastly, this title elevates the existing Federal Interagency Committee on Education by giving it statutory authority and providing that the Secretary will be the chair. The committee would be a mechanism to insure the consistent and coordinated administration of policies and practices by Federal agencies in the conduct of education programs.

TITLE III

This title transfers agencies and functions. The largest amount of programs come from the transfer of the entire Education Division of HEW. There are, however, other transfers from HEW itself which are outside the Education Division. These include the Institute of Museum Services, any advisory committees relating principally to education, responsibilities of the Secretary of HEW for Education programs in the Education Division, the Inspector General functions relating to programs in the new Department, the Office for Civil Rights education functions, budgetary oversight of various special institutions, telecommunications demonstration projects, and health professions and student loans (medical doctors and nurses).

This section also transfers components from other departments and agencies. These include:

From the Department of Agriculture.—The child nutrition and nutrition education programs (other than women, infants, and children feeding programs) will be transferred. These are mainly the school feeding programs—the largest of which is the national school lunch program. This transfer does not include the surplus agricultural commodity program, which will remain in the Department of Agriculture.

From the Department of the Interior.—The programs relating to the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts will be transferred. These relate to the operation of the schools, the Johnson-O'Malley education assistance, and the continuing education programs.

From the Department of Defense.—The operation and administration of the overseas dependent schools will be transferred. The schools would be phased in over a 3-year period.

From the National Science Foundation.—Programs relating to science education will be transferred. Programs which the Director of the Office of Management and Budget determines relate to fellowships and traineeships integral to the support of scientific research and development, ethical, value and science policy issues or communicating science values to nonscientists will not be transferred.

From the Department of Justice.—Student loan and grant programs known as the law enforcement and education program and the law enforcement intern program will be transferred.

From the Department of Housing and Urban Development.—The college Housing loan program will be transferred.

TITLE IV

This title contains the personnel provisions and general administrative authorities for the Secretary. The bill transfers existing positions in the General Schedule pool to the Department and authorizes 71 new supergrade positions for the Department. Twenty-one of these positions would replace the supergrades already created by statute in the education division. The bill also authorizes the Secretary to appoint professional and technical employees in a number not to exceed one-third of the total number of employees of the Office and 15 temporary supergrades for transittional tasks for a period limited to 3 years after the effective date of this act. Section 412 authorizes the Secretary to delegate functions to employees in the Department where the Act does not provide otherwise. Section 413 establishes the procedure and safeguards of the Secretary's reorganization power within the Department. The other provisions provide standard administrative powers such as power to contract, use facilities, make a report, design a seal, establish a working capital fund, et cetera. The Secretary would also be required to make an annual report on the assessment of educational progress and improved coordination of functions within the Department.

TITLE V

This title is concerned with transitional, savings, and conforming provisions. Some of the significant provisions are: transfer of personnel and funds; termination by operation of law of any existing office or agency all of whose functions are transferred; authorization of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to make determinations of incidental transfers of personnel and funds relating to transferred programs; the continuation of existing orders, proceedings, et cetera, made before the transfers by parent agencies until modified by the Secretary or the President; conforming amendments; and the redesignation of HEW as the Department of Health and Welfare.

TITLE VI

This title is concerned with interim dates and appointments. It provides for the effective date of the Department as 180 days after the Secretary takes the oath of office and allows appointments of the principal officers and promulgation of regualtions before the effective date.

SUMMARY OF HEARINGS

The committee conducted 10 days of hearings and heard testimony from more than 100 witnesses. These hearings spanned many areas of interest regarding the creation of the Department of Education. Out of the 10 days of hearings, nearly 4 were devoted to the general concept of the Department, 2 were concerned with the transfer of child nutrition programs, another was spent considering the transfer of the Department of Defense Dependents Schools and the science education programs from the National Science Foundation, 1 day each was devoted to the proposed transfer of Head Start and Indian education, and the administration testified on two occasions.

October 12.—The committee opened the first congressional hearings in 25 years on Department of Education legislation. Three panels of witnesses testified. The first, composed of Senators Pell, Domenici, and Bellmon, expressed their support for the creation of the Department and their appreciation to the committee for commencing hearings on the issue.

The second panel was composed of three members of the citizen's committee for a separate Department of Education. James Farmer, Dr. Carl Marburger, and Winfield Kelly, Jr. underscored the long-overdue need for a Cabinet-level Department of Education. They said a Department of Education could give more attention to education in the Federal Government, and involve parents and citizens more in the educational process.

The third panel consisted of academic authorities in education administration. These authorities, Rufus Miles, Jr., Dr. Stephen Bailey, and Dr. Samuel Halperin, emphasized the administrative gains would be made in Federal education programs through the creation of an education department. They testified that education is smothered by the concerns of health and welfare in HEW and competes poorly for budget and personnel.

October 13.—In the first panel, the committee heard from the so-called "big six" national education organizations. Representatives from the National Education Association, Council of Chief State School Officers, National Association of State Boards of Education, National Congress of Parents and Teachers, and the American Association of School Administrators supported the creation of the Department, and emphasized the need for more direction, leadership, and coordination at the Federal level.

The second panel consisted of six former U.S. Commissioners of Education, including Dr. Terrel Bell, Dr. Sidney Marland, Harold Howe II, Francis Keppel, Dr. Sterling McMurrin, and Dr. Samuel Brownell. The former commissioners related to the committee their administrative and policy experiences, observations, and frustrations with the U.S. Office of Education. Messrs. Howe and Brownell urged further study of the concept by the committee before making decisions. Messrs. Bell, Marland, McMurrin and Marland gave their support to the bill, and recommended the committee balance educational interests in the new Department's structure.

March 20.—The first panel testified on the general concept of the Department of Education. It was composed of representatives of two student groups and the president of the American Federation of Government Employees, Local 2607, HEW Education Division. The student groups supported the new Department, and advocated the creation of channels for student input. The union president, Barbara Kemp, illustrated the present lack of leadership and coordination for education matters in the Federal Government. Ms. Kemp told the committee there was low morale in the Office of Education.

The second panel included various experts in the area of school feeding programs, including representatives of the American School Food Service Association. The ASESA's testimony reflected a "fear of the unknown." It listed conditions to be fulfilled before it would support the transfer, including the creation of an assistant secretary for child nutrition, a commitment to expansion and universal school feeding, retention of nutrition education and training of school food service personnel, and maintenance of the provision of surplus and nonsurplus agricultural commodities to the schools. Support for the transfer was expressed by Dorothy Van Egmond, Fairfax County Public Schools food services director, who said USDA regulations are not sympathetic to the working relationships cafeteria managers have with school administrators.

March 21.—Three panels discussed the general concept of the creation of separate Department of Education. The first was composed of witnesses representing concerns of State and local governments. Illinois State Superintendent of Education Joseph Cronin, in supporting the legislation, emphasized the inability of States to deal with Federal education programs and offices at fourth and fifth levels of bureaucracy. The Education Commission of the States cautioned that great care must be taken in creating the Department to insure it will be responsive to State and local needs. Although the panel expressed some concern for the traditional role of the States in education, Pennsylvania State Representative Helen Wise said the creation of the new Department would present an opportunity to improve Federal, State and local relations in education.

The second panel consisted of two organizations opposing the creation of the Department—the American Federation of Teachers, and the U.S. Catholic Conference. Albert Shanker, president of the A.F.T., proposed a reorganization within HEW instead of the separate Department. Shanker argued linkages should be developed between education, and health and welfare. Msgr. Wilfred Paradis, secretary of education for the Catholic Conference, said the new Department might destroy "pluralism" in American education, and might not be sensitive to the need of private education.

Four higher education groups made up the third panel: American Association of Community and Junior Colleges, American Council on Education, State Higher Education Executive Officers, and American Association of University Professors. Each group, with the exception of ACE, supported the new Department, and urged that a high-level official in the new Department be established to address the needs of higher education. The ACE, while not taking a formal position on the legislation, also recommended a high-level officer and suggested changes in the bill to insure effective coordination of Federal education programs.

April 14.—James McIntyre, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, made the first of two appearances before the Committee to testify on S. 991.

Mr. McIntyre, on behalf of the administration, favored the creation of a Cabinet-level Department of Education. He endorsed S. 991 and its proposed transfers, except for the following recommendations: the option of transferring the National Endowments for the Arts and for the Humanities and the training and youth services programs should be reserved for future consideration. He also suggested that the nursing loan and scholarship program, the health profession student loan program, the law enforcement education program and the internship programs, and the Indian student higher education assistance program should be transferred to the new Department. The administration also recommended the establishment of an intergovernmental advisory council on education. As a general recommendation, the administration believed that programs should be organized around groups served by the Department.

April 18.—The first panel discussed the transfer of the Department of Defense Dependents Schools to the Education Department. I. M. Greenberg, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Program Management, expressed the DOD's support for the transfer of the school system and said any logistical problems could be worked out with close cooperation between DOD and the new Department. Carl Moore, Overseas Education Association executive director, said it was unreasonable to expect the DOD to have the expertise in running efficiently the schools, and the system should be in a Department whose primary goal is education. Two past presidents of the European Congress of Parents, Teachers and Students expressed concern that the logistical support and military community responsibility for the overseas dependents schools would suffer if the transfer were made.

The second panel directed its attention to the transfer of science education programs from the National Science Foundation to the new Department. Three science groups were concerned that the ties science education has with science in general, and particularly with scientists and research, will be lost if the transfer is made. A representative of the President's science advisor supported the transfer.

April 27.—Originally, S. 991 transferred the Head Start program from the Office of Human Development Services in HEW to the new Department of Education. This provision, however, was deleted in the committee's markup of the legislation. The committee nevertheless devoted one day of hearings to this proposed transfer. Senator Brooke and Representative Chisholm testified that the program operates very successfully now in HEW and should not be tampered with. The fear that educators would not maintain the unique, comprehensive, and parent-involvement approach of Head Start was reflected in testimony by the Children's Defense Fund, National Head Start Association, and the National Congress of Hispanic American Citizens. Support for the transfer was expressed by a representative of the California Department of Education, a Project Head Start coordinator, and a professor of early child development. In addition, James Parham, deputy assistant secretary for human development services, HEW, presented the administration's position of supporting the transfer of Head Start.

May 8.—The committee held a second day of hearings on the issue of the transfer of child nutrition programs to the Department of Education. There were four panels of witnesses who testified.

Carol Foreman, assistant secretary for food and consumer services at USDA, favored the transfer on behalf of USDA and the administration. Ms. Foreman said administering child nutrition programs from the Department of Education would lead to more complete integration of nutrition in the schools. She also said the commodity programs would continue to operate successfully, and would not be affected by the transfer.

Support for the transfer also came from a panel of witnesses comprised of a representative of the Council of Chief State School Officers, the Society for Nutrition Education, and the administrator of the New York City school food services. They said schools would benefit from parallel administration of the child nutrition programs by Federal, State and local education agencies. They also emphasized the opportunity for increased coordination between the classroom and the cafeteria if the transfer were made.

Opposition to the transfer was voiced by a panel of nutrition groups and a panel of commodity groups. The former panel, consisting of the Food Research Action Center, Community Nutrition Institute, Children's Foundation, and the ASFSA, was concerned that educators would not expand the delivery of child feeding programs, and that within the new Department other educational programs would take precedence. These groups also argued that while in the past USDA might not traditionally have been receptive to the programs, recent progress has been made and the transfer is untimely.

The commodity panel, composed of representatives of the National Cattlemen's Association, National Milk Producers Federation, Poultry and Egg Institute, and the American Farm Burau feared the Department of Education would cash out the commodity program. Further, the members of this panel underscored the experience and expertise USDA has in dealing with child nutrition.

May 16.—The committee held a full day of hearings on the transfer of Indian education programs from the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the new Department. A wide divergence of opinion developed among the members of the Indian community present on this issue.

The Navajo Division of Education, the First American Caucus of the National Education Association, the All Indian Pueblo Council, the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, and two Federal officials supported the transfer if certain conditions and safeguards were met, including maintenance of the trust responsibility, preservation of existing eligibility and Indian preference requirements, and continuation of self-determination, among others.

Opposing the transfer were the National Tribal Chairmen's Association, the National Congress of American Indians, the National Indian Education Association, American Indian Higher Education Consortium, Coalition of Indian-Controlled School Boards, Northern Cheyenne Tribe, Minnesota Chippewas, and Affiliated Tribes of Northwest Indians. Their concerns centered on the fear the trust responsibility of the Federal Government would be eroded. They also argued there was little consultation with Indian tribes on the transfer, and the proposed move would be the beginning of the dismantling of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

The administration's support for the transfer of BIA education functions, along with those of HEW, was presented by James Joseph, Under Secretary of the Interior, and Dr. Gerald Gipp, Deputy Commissioner of Education for Indian Education. The administration pledged its continued commitment to the Federal Government's trust responsibility, and proposed the transfer of the BIA schools be "phased-in" to the new Department over a 3-year period to minimize disruption.

May 17.—Returning to testify on the Committee's tenth and final day of hearings on S. 991 was James McIntyre, Director of the Office of Management and Budget. He was accompanied by Hale Champion, Under Secretary of HEW.

Under Secretary Champion expressed the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's commitment to the creation of the Department of Education. Mr. Champion said education has the size, scope, and character to deserve its own place in the Cabinet, and that better coordination of other educational functions would result.

Mr. McIntyre's testimony outlined the organizational structure of the new Department of Education as envisioned by the administration. His recommendations included: the establishment of a statutorily based intergovernmental advisory council on education, the elevation of the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to the secretariat level, the creation of 14 executive level positions reporting directly to the Secretary. (including an executive level IV position for the Office of Civil Rights), organizing the Office of Inspector General in accordance with the provisions of the Inspector General bill pending before the committee, placing research and improvement in a high-level position, and the establishment of a mechanism to encourage public and parental involvement. The administration further advocated that at least two assistant secretary-level positions should be allocated according to functional lines for programs currently in HEW's Education Division, and the programs that are transferred to the new Department must be moved intact and the leadership of them must come from the pool of 14 executive-level positions.

AREAS OF DISCUSSION

CITIZEN INVOLVEMENT

The committee intends that citizen participation in the implementation of Federal education programs be a major function of the Department.

In testimony before the committee, Dr. Carl Marburger, director of the National Committee for Citizens in Education, stated the importance of citizen participation for increasing confidence in schools and children's educational abilities. Lack of confidence in public schools is alarming. According to the National Center for Educational Statistics, the percentage of people with "hardly any confidence in people running education" has nearly doubled from 1973 to 1976. A 1976 Gallup survey found that 59 percent feel the quality of education is declining. Studies showing increasing declines in high school graduates' reading skills and SAT scores reinforce the lack of confidence in our schools. Even more alarming is that lack of confidence surfaced in the voting booth, where in 1975, 56 percent of all bond issues before the public were rejected.

Also, although in the next decade postsecondary school enrollment will decrease by 15 percent, and elementary school enrollment will decrease by 8 percent, costs are expected to rise by 65 percent.[1] Support from the public will be needed even more as schools will continue to be pressed financially.

Educational research, such as the widely read Coleman study, and subsequent studies based on the Coleman data note that when parents participate in school affairs their children do bettter in school.[2] Also, when children observe their parents having an impact on the school, their self-image becomes more positive. Enhanced self-image has been linked to student achievement in many studies.

In sum, it appears that increased parent and citizen participation in the education process not only assists in increasing confidence in the schools, but also has an impact on the decline in student performance.

Dr. Marburger's testimony pointed out the lack of attention in the Federal education system for concerns of parents and citizens:

> Aside from one person on the title I ESEA staff to handle parent advisory councils, there is no one in the entire HEW Education Division specifically designated to handle parent and citizen concerns.
> There is no parent representation and only token citizen and student participation on federal education advisory councils, according to a study NCCE recently conducted.
> There is no significant effort through the ERIC system or at the National Institute of Education to provide information directly to interested parents and citizens, despite a clear mandate to disseminate information about public education in such a way as to aid the people of the United States.

[2] Ibid, Marburger testimony, p. 30.

> The force of many provisions in education law about citizen participation has been dissipated by the lack of a coherent policy governing this issue and the lack of consistent enforcement of the provisions.
> The present scattering of education programs all over the government is confusing, and it is difficult for an outsider to identify, let alone reach responsible officials.[3]

Already existing with respect to certain education laws are provisions for citizen participation, although there is no coherent policy governing the issue and no consistent enforcement of the provisions.

Student participation was also discussed in hearings before the committee. Lawrence S. Zaglaniczny, executive director of the Coalition of Independent College and University Students, stated in testimony before the committee, "in the past students have not been included very much in the decisionmaking process."

Both Mr. Zaglaniczny and Joel Packer, legislative director of the National Student Lobby/National Student Association Coalition, suggested the need for a unit which would allow students to be consulted on decisions affecting them and to bring student ideas from across the Nation into the decisionmaking process of the Department.[4]

Their testimony supported the need for increased student involvement and input. Mr. Zaglaniczny stated:

> At the present time, there are no formal channels for the views of the 11 million students enrolled in institutions of postsecondary education to be heard.[5]

He suggested that students be represented on the National Advisory Committee, originally proposed in S. 991, and that the commission conduct studies and produce reports on the condition of the involvement of students and parents in educational decisionmaking at the State, local, and national level. During the committee markup, Senator Percy added the word "students" in several areas of the bill to insure that students would be actively involved in the participatory process.

S. 991 provides a mechanism where input can be provided from among citizens, including parents and students. One of the major functions of the Department will be to assess parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required by law and to encourage the involvement of parents, students, and the public in the development and implementation of the Department's programs.

The committee suggests the Secretary consider establishing an Office of Citizen, Parent and Student Concern to perform this public participation function. OMB Director McIntyre's testimony before the committee recommended such an office. This office could be the public's access point to the Department. It would be an effective means for insuring citizen and parent participation in Federal educational programs and for rebuilding public confidence in education. If such an office were created, it would be responsible for monitoring the enforcement of parent and citizen participation provisions now in law and informing the public of opportunities to participate in educational policy determination. It could identify program authorities and funds that could or should be used to encourage parent involvement, and assess the effectiveness of parent involvement strategies.

Already existing within the Office of the Commissioner of Education are several offices of special concern (for example, offices for minorities, women, and the handicapped). These offices could be consolidated in this Office and benefit from the resulting coordination and increased visibility. A 1977 study by the Education Commission of the States concluded that Hispanics are consistently below their contemporaries in the rest of the Nation in reading, science, mathematics, social studies, and career development. A unit within this Office for Hispanic Affairs could insure that the Hispanic community is involved in matters of interest to it and could monitor and evaluate existing requirements to insure that Hispanic participation occurs where the law warrants it.

Some of the specific functions this Office could perform would be the following:

(2) Assess, and report to the Secretary on the implementation of parent, student, or citizen involvement provisions in current law or proposed legislation, and make recommendations concerning the analysis and assessment of this involvement. The Office could be used by the Secretary as a vehicle for coordinating the numerous parent, student, or citizen appointments to departmental boards, commissions, or other panels;

(3) Provide assistance and consultative services to program staff in developing appropriate means for public involvement;

(4) Serve an ombudsman-type function by receiving and channeling for proper attention complaints, grievances, or other input from the public within the Department. This could make the Department aware of the needs of parents, students, and citizens and their involvement in the educational process;

(5) Serve as liaison with education advisory committees, the Federal Interagency Committee on Education, the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education, and the Assistant Secretary who has responsibility for intergovernmental affairs. Thus, stronger institutional community ties could be achieved by an effective mechanism responsible for achieving increased citizen involvement in the Department's programs and activities;

(6) Consult with various entities within the Department, such as the Office for Educational Research and Improvement, which are engaged in research or studies pertaining to parent, student, or citizen involvement in education; and

(7) Engage in the dissemination of valuable information on opportunities for parent, student, and citizen involvement in the Department's administration and policy development processes.

The committee believes such an Office, if created, should be at a sufficiently high level in the Department to insure its maximum usefulness and effect. Parent, student, and citizen involvement must cut across all functions of the Department for it to be successful and to rebuild lost confidence in education.

OFFICE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS

A major purpose of the Department is to continue and improve the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities. The Department will assume responsibility for effectively carrying out the Nation's civil rights laws in education. The Secretary of Education will provide for the effective administration of civil rights laws.

S. 991 provides for the education components of HEW's Office for Civil Rights to be moved into the new Department. The education-related civil rights functions will be concerned with such provisions as title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (racial and ethnic discrimination); title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 (sex discrimination); section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (discrimination against the physically and mentally handicapped); Executive Order 11246 (employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, national origin); and Indian preference functions of Public Law 93–638 (Indian Self-Determination Act).

The progress in civil rights enforcement in education during the past 18 years has led to substantial improvements, but much remains to be done.

The transfer of HEW's education-related civil rights responsibilities provided for under S. 991 is fully consistent with a mandate first expressed in title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that all Federal agencies assure nondiscrimination in the programs they administer. In order to implement this mandate effectively, organizational arrangements within the new Department will include:

> The creation of an Office for Civil Rights, independent of the Department's programs, whose director will report directly to the Secretary.
> The designation of the director of the office at an executive level IV position, and appointed by the President with Senate confirmation.
> A requirement that the Director for Civil Rights be delegated authority by the Secretary for insuring that all civil rights laws are enforced in all program units of the new Department, and a prohibition against any redelegation of this authority to any official not directly responsible to the Assistant Secretary.
> A requirement that the Director prepare and transmit directly an independent report to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress concerning the status of compliance with the civil rights laws relating to education. The report would include a statement concerning the Director's plans and recommendations to insure improved enforcement of and continued compliance with the civil rights laws relating to education.

These proposals will assure adherence to civil rights enforcement within the program units of the Department. Presently, the Director of HEW's Office for Civil Rights performs at a GS–18 level. This position is not Presidentially appointed, nor subject to Senate advice and consent. The increased status assigned to the function by

S. 991 will (1) improve the ability to recruit high-level individuals; (2) demonstrate the importance the Federal Government places on civil rights enforcement in education; and (3) assure that the head of civil rights enforcement is accountable to the President and to Congress, as well as to the Secretary.

By including in the Department of Education certain education and related programs not now under HEW's jurisdiction, the Federal Government will be better able to promote equal educational opportunity. The Department of Education will be responsible for civil rights enforcement not only in those programs presently in HEW, but also in certain transferred programs now scattered across other departments and agencies, such as USDA's school lunch and related programs, BIA schools, DOD overseas schools, and Justice's student loan programs.

HEW's Office for Civil Rights estimates that approximately 80 percent of its employees work on education-related responsibilities. This proportion of activity would be transferred to the new Department. In order to insure the Federal Government's commitment to guarantee and secure the basic education-related civil rights of all citizens, the Office for Civil Rights must be staffed adequately to carry out its responsibilities. Under the President's fiscal year 1979 budget proposal, it will have approximately 1,500 staff.

In addition to the concern expressed for adequate and qualified staff in education activities, adequate staff for the health and welfare areas is also of concern.

During the April 14 hearings on the bill, Senator Percy specifically requested from the administration whether additional staff would be required to handle civil rights activities in health and welfare and what would be the effect of the transfer on the effectiveness of civil rights activities in the areas of health and welfare. James McIntyre, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, responded that this transfer would enhance civil rights activities in the health and welfare areas:

> These areas have been dwarfed by education within HEW; in the Department of Health and Welfare they would clearly be given the greater attention they deserve.[6]

In addition, he said:

> It may be necessary to add some staff to handle the civil rights activities in the health and welfare areas.

Mr. McIntyre assured the committee that additional staff would be requested of the Congress if they are needed for health and welfare enforcement.

During the course of its deliberations on S. 991, the committee identified several other issues related to civil rights enforcement that were not appropriate for resolution within the context of this act. Nonetheless, it does have concerns about each of the issues, and expects the Secretary of Education, working with other executive branch officials and appropriate congressional committees, to deal with them in carrying out his or her civil rights responsibilities. These concerns are with respect to the following areas:

[6] Letter of June 16, 1978, to Chairman Abraham Ribicoff by James T. McIntyre, Jr., Director, Office of Management and Budget.

1. Staffing

OCR must be staffed adequately to carry out its duties. OMB estimates that 1,500 staff will be transferred from HEW's Office for Civil Rights to the new Department's OCR. Civil rights groups have contended that this may not be adequate, especially in light of recent court orders, most notably Adams v. Califano, and in light of the additional responsibilities which OCR will inherit as a result of the non-HEW education programs placed in the new Department. The committee is not prepared to make a judgment on this issue at this time. It does note, though, that OMB Director McIntyre committed himself in his July 10 letter to Chairman Ribicoff to review OCR's staffing needs within 1 year after the Department's creation "to be certain that the office is capable of carrying out its mandate." The committee believes this is a reasonable approach, and expects OMB to report its findings of this review to the appropriate congressional committees when it is completed, but not later than 15 months after the Department's creation.

2. Compliance procedures

Too often civil rights compliance procedures have been unclear and left too wide administrative discretion. As a consequence, confusion and ineffective enforcement results. This has been true in education as well as in other areas.

The committee believes the creation of a new Office for Civil Rights in the Department of Education presents an opportunity to improve these procedures. It recognizes, as Director McIntyre pointed out in his July 10 letter to Chairman Ribicoff on the civil rights functions in the Department, that the President's reorganization project is conducting a major review of the enforcement of civil rights laws in all federally financed services, including education. It expects that this review will examine a range of options to improve compliance procedures. The committee is especially interested in recommendations that will improve the civil rights effort Government-wide. In particular, the committee expects the study to assess and report on ways to coordinate better enforcement efforts and the use of effective administrative procedures for suspension of Federal assistance in cases where there has been a finding of discrimination. The committee hopes the reorganization project can discuss its findings and recommendations with appropriate congressional committees early in 1979 so they can be taken into consideration during the implementation phase for the Department of Education.

3. Data

The committee believes that adequate data are essential to effective civil rights enforcement. Hence, nothing in this proposed legislation shall be construed to interfere with the enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, or any other nondiscrimination provision of Federal law, nor to abrogate or otherwise limit the timely collection of such information, or the securing of such records as are necessary to insure the complete and uniform enforcement of these acts among the recipients of the Department's programs.

At the same time, however, OCR must consistently review its data requests in the interest of limiting paperwork. OCR should, in order to help meet this objective, coordinate its information requests with other agencies in and out of the Department, to make sure it is not asking for data that already exists or will be collected, or to see if modifications of non-OCR data collection systems could provide a more effective and less burdensome means of meeting the necessary enforcement data requirements. After such coordination, however, the committee believes OCR should have the authority to appeal directly to the Office of Management and Budget the right to request any data it determines are needed to enforce the law in such cases where other agencies have tried to delay or reduce OCR's collection capacity, or have refused to accommodate civil rights data needs in their own systems, during this coordination process. The Director should specifically identify any problem he or she has in collecting data in OCR's annual report to Congress, and suggest recommendations to solve these problems.

4. Legal staff

As previously noted, OCR is a law enforcement agency and, as such, should have at its disposal an adequate legal staff to help it carry out the functions, powers, and duties of the office. The Secretary must insure that legal staff paid for with civil rights' funds should only work on civil rights issues.

The OCR Director should have the authority to select, appoint, and employ such officers or employees, including an adequate staff of attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions, powers, and duties of the office. In particular, the legal staff in both the regional and national offices, which is paid for out of the Office for Civil Rights budget, should report to the Director or his or her designee.

The Director, as part of his or her annual report to the Congress, should report on the adequacy and availability of the legal staff at OCR's disposal. OMB should also report to the Congress on this issue in its report on OCR staffing referred to earlier.

During the 6-month implementation phase for creating the Department, the Secretary should work closely with interested groups and individuals concerned with education-related civil rights. Careful attention should be given during this process to addressing the needs of all groups, especially blacks, Hispanics, Asians, women, the handicapped, and the aged. The committee suggests the Secretary investigate the feasibility of setting up a branch of the Office which would be concerned with the protection of the special and unique rights of American Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts.

The establishment of the Office for Civil Rights provides an opportunity to improve current procedures. The active involvement of those involved in insuring the achievement of equal educational opportunities will be needed. Therefore, these individuals both in and out of government should be consulted to obtain suggestions for possible improvements that could be made during the transition.

The committee expects the Office of Management and Budget will exercise oversight management authority to make certain the Department gives its civil rights responsibilities high priority, and expects the Department of Justice to exercise its supervisory powers regarding title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 under Executive Order 11247.

DEPARTMENT ROLE IN ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

S. 991 provides for the establishment within the new Department of an Office of Elementary and Secondary Education to be headed by an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Eduction. The committee estimates the new Office will administer more than $6 billion for education programs and have an estimated staff of 864. Since the 1960's, primary Federal education effort has been to increase access to education and to help move toward equal education opportunity for all Americans. The Office of Elementary and Secondary Education will continue this effort by supplementing and complementing State and local government's efforts to eradicate educational inequity and to insure economic productivity.

Although the lives of more than 48 million students in elementary and secondary day schools are touched by the programs established by the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the direction and administration of these programs is currently assigned to a number of officials buried within the U.S. Office of Education structure. There is little apparent effort by these officials to coordinate these programs to most effectively meet the needs of students in their communities and classrooms.

By placing these programs in the new Department under the jurisdiction of an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education, the committee believes that coordination for better delivery of Federal services to students, schools, and local education agencies can be achieved. A highly visible Assistant Secretary should be accessible and responsive to concerns of local school officials, teachers, parents, and students. An Assistant Secretary can better direct programs officers in streamlining delivery and will have authority to institute delivery procedures which are responsive to the needs of local communities. An Assistant Secretary can oversee the total process of administering Federal education program in such a way that the dollars Congress intends to be expended on actual program operation will go to schools where teaching and learning take place, rather than be squandered on administrative functions in the Federal and State bureaucracies.

This office would be expected to administer such programs as the following:

Title I of ESEA

Title I of ESEA accounts for 47 percent of all Federal elementary and secondary spending. It provides grants to local school districts on a formula basis to help them improve their educational programs to meet the special needs of educationally disadvantaged children. In addition, grants are made to State agencies for the education of handicapped children, for dependent and neglected children, for orphans and juvenile delinquents in State institutions, and for children of migratory workers.

In recent years, the title I program has begun to generate a substantial impact in improved reading and math skills among disadvantaged youths, showing month-for-month gains in reading achievement nearly double that experienced by the general school population and 50 percent greater than that experienced by disadvantaged children not served by title I. Program evaluations funded by HEW and a 3-year evaluation of the program conducted by the National Institute of Education explain those successes as the result of an increased capacity on the part of local education agencies in the practical art of educating the disadvantaged population.

In spite of these successes, only 45 percent of the eligible title I children are being served. An Office of Elementary and Secondary Education will provide an administrative structure which can assure that the funds appropriated actually reach the classroom level where they may be used to provide educational services to disadvantaged youths.

Support and innovation

The consolidated programs contained within "support and innovation" grants consist of (1) supplementary educational centers and services; (2) strengthening State and local education agencies; (3) dropout prevention projects; and (4) school nutrition and health services. When the Congress consolidated these various programs into title IV of ESEA (in Public Law 93-380), one of the primary purposes of that action was to reduce paperwork and regulations and to provide greater flexibility at the State and local levels. However, the current Office of Education has not yet fully restructured its operation to deal effectively with this consolidation. As noted by Senator Henry Bellmon in testimony before this committee, such failure by OE clearly "demonstrates how administrative organization at the Federal level can impede legislative intent." [7]

Bilingual education

The bilingual education program supports local classroom instructional projects and assists in developing State, local, and university capabilities for training bilingual school personnel. In addition, the program also provides resources for bilingual instructional material, and supports research and evaluation studies.

Currently, the bilingual program serves only about 250,000 of the estimated 3.5 million students with limited English-speaking ability. Recent studies have indicated that these students are generally below their peers in basic educational skills. Given the basic responsibility for bilingual education, the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education should work in close coordination with the Office of Research and Improvement, the Office for Civil Rights, and the Office of Postsecondary Education to ensure that the total education needs of bilingual students are being addressed.

The right-to-read program provides facilitating services and resources to stimulate educational institutions, governmental agencies, and private organizations to improve and expand their activities related to reading. The long-range goal of this program is to promote functional literacy, meaning effective use of oral and written language which includes listening, speaking, reading, and writing. The Office of Education has estimated that between 40 and 50 percent of students in urban areas have reading problems: 90 percent of school dropouts are classified as poor readers; and 50 percent of urban unemployed young people are unable to read. A recent GAO investigation of the right-to-read program found little evidence of coordination between right to read and the other $1 billion worth of Federal programs designed to improve basic reading skills. By placing the program in an office handling the major elementary and secondary education programs, a real opportunity will exist for insuring that these Federal programs directed toward improving basic skills are not duplicative and that the funds expended for these programs have maximum impact.

Follow Through

Follow Through is designed to sustain and augment in primary grades the gains that children from low-income families make in Head Start and other quality preschool programs. Follow Through provides comprehensive education services, such as special instruction programs, health, and nutrition, which will aid in the continued development of children to their full potential. Follow Through will provide an organizational base in the new Office for a closer working relationship among elementary and secondary education programs and comprehensive preschool education programs.

School assistance in federally affected areas

School assistance in federally affected areas (impact aid) provides payments in lieu of taxes to school districts to compensate them for real property within the district which, because it is federally owned, yields no taxes to support the school system and because of impaction of students upon school facilities and operating budgets due to Federal activity. Impact aid was the first Federal legislation authorizing major support for elementary and secondary education. It currently serves 4,354 school districts located in 411 congressional districts throughout the Nation.

Emergency School Aid Act (ESAA)

ESAA is designed to assist local education agencies, public or nonprofit private organizations and institutions in the process of eliminating, reducing, or preventing minority group isolation and aiding school children in overcoming the educational disadvantage of minority group isolation.

In addition, programs such as the alcohol and drug abuse program and the libraries and learning resources program, might also be included in this Office.

DEPARTMENT ROLE IN POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION

American postsecondary education is a large and diverse enterprise enrolling more than 13 million students in some 3,000 colleges and universities, 4 million students in 1,000 community colleges and over 8,000 noncollegiate vocational postsecondary institutions. Higher education alone is almost a $50 billion a year enterprise which employs more than 600,000 instructional and research staff and 1.3 million administrative and support personnel. Of the estimated $22 billion Federal spending on education, approximately $9.6 billion is directed to postsecondary education.

The bill would establish an Office for Postsecondary Education, headed by an Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education, to assure that the needs and concerns of this major sector of education are represented at the highest levels of the Department of Education. The Office would have a staff of approximately 1,200 and have program spending authority in the approximate amount of $3.6 billion.

The need for a high-level spokesperson for higher education was discussed during the committee's hearings on S. 991. One fear raised by some in the higher education community was that a Department of Education might be dominated by elementary and secondary education interests. However, in terms of dollars expended, higher education and elementary/secondary interests are approximately the same. Both categories are funded near $4.5 billion. Dr. Sidney Marland, in testimony before the committee stated:

> While the higher education programs are fewer in number, they are substantially in parity in terms of dollars with elementary and secondary. (Marland, p. 328.)[8]

In response to a written question submitted by Senator Ribicoff to former U.S. Commissioners of Education Dr. Terrel Bell, Dr. Samuel Brownell, Harold Howe, II, Francis Keppel, Dr. Sidney Marland, and Dr. Sterling McMurrin requesting suggestions for balancing elementary and secondary and higher education interests, the overwhelming response supported the need for an Assistant Secretary or Under Secretary for Postsecondary Education.[9] Support for this position was also given by Robert L. Egbert, dean, Teachers College, University of Nebraska at Lincoln, on behalf of the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education, the Dean's Network and Wilbur Cohen, dean of the School of Education of the University of Michigan.

The Department will become the lead Federal agency in coordinating Federal policies and programs designed to improve postsecondary educational opportunities in the nation. Promoting equal access to postsecondary education should be accomplished primarily by maintaining direct grant and loan assistance programs for qualified and needy students.

Major institutional assistance, with certain exceptions, would not be possible under current congressional authorizations. A notable exception is assistance to developing institutions. Also, the Department would be able to improve institutional capacities through a variety of special grant programs which respond to the specific educational needs of students or instiutions engaged in high quality educational or research programs.

The Department will also be expected to assist the growth and development of a variety of academic programs and related services offered at our Nation's public and private postsecondary institutions. Among the special programs requiring departmental attention and commitments are continuing education programs, lifelong learning library facilities and training programs associated with college instruction and research, counseling and community services, and institutional offerings relating to special services for individuals and groups underrepresented in higher education and certain technical and professional fields.

Characteristics of and changes in postsecondary education

Postsecondary education in this country is exceedingly diverse and extensive. Sectarian and private groups maintain and operate more than one-half of the Nation's 3,000 colleges and universities. Institutions of higher education serve many purposes and many different clients. Each of these institutions should be able to choose and pursue its own course. Department officials should guard against carrying out any practices which have the impact of homogenizing or standardizing policies and services developed by State, local, or private higher education officials and their governing boards or of intruding into the areas central to the autonomy of such institutions.

The Department should initiate procedures that recognize the changing characteristics in postsecondary education. There are significant changes occurring in postsecondary school enrollment. While current projections indicate only moderate increases in enrollment over the next decade, the impact of major changes in curriculum, expansion of student aid programs to middle-income families, and the doubling of part-time enrollment by 1986 may bring a larger increase in enrollment than currently projected.

Support for R. & D. at colleges and universities

Researchers and graduate students at colleges and universities are principal participants in the Nation's basic research effort. Approximately two-thirds of all Federal R. & D. efforts, or about $3.6 billion fiscal year 1979 OMB estimate), are obligated to colleges and universities. Federal agencies involved in basic research, such as NSF, NIH, the Departments of Defense and Energy, will continue their funding of the majority of the research dollars flowing to universities. Although the majortiy of the funds for research, evaluation, policy studies, and demonstrations will undoubtedly remain outside the jurisdiction of the Office of Post Secondary Education, the committee expects this Office to play a major role in assisting the research agenda for postsecondary education issues.

Role of the Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education

A primary responsibility of the Assistant Secretary will be to keep the Secretary and the Congress advised of trends in American postsecondary education. The Assistant Secretary will establish continuing reltationships with students, faculty, administrators, trustees, and other leaders to identify issues and problems and to make recommendations for improvements in Federal education programs affecting postsecondary education. Streamlining regulatory requirements and paperwork burdens, which currently hamstring many postsecondary institutions, should be one of the first orders of business.

The committee foresees the Assistant Secretary for Post Secondary Education as the leading figure in directing, coordinating and implementing departmental programs with respect to postsecondary student assistance, institutions and community colleges, and institutional support.

The bulk of the Department's funds for postsecondary institutions will support the several major programs of student financial assistance, which will be administered by the Office of the Assistant Secretary. Federal financial assistance to undergraduates has become a critical factor determining whether or not students from lower and middle income families attend a postsecondary institution. More than 82 percent of the Federal aid to postsecondary education includes grants and loans to students. Of this amount, 91 percent eventually goes to undergraduate institutions.

This act transfers four additional direct student aid programs to be grouped with approximately one dozen direct assistance programs administered by the Bureau of Student Fnancial Assistance in USEO. The Assistant Secretary will adminsiter all "need-tested" Federal student assistance programs. "Need tested" means that financial assistance grants and loans area warded according to the student's or his or her family's ability to pay the cost of posesecondary instruction, and the price of education at a particular college or university.

The Assistant Secretary should consider the benefits associated with subsequent consolidation and coordination proposals. Effective coordination within this Office will greatly enlarge the capacity for simplifying the application process and increase the Federal ability to minimize the cost of defaulted loans by an improved collection process. Most importantly, a single agency will be able to analyze Federal student loan trends and problems in terms of longrun indebtedness to the student and problems in terms of longrun indebtedness to the student and his or her family and in terms of grants programs directed toward equal education opportunities at the postsecondary levels.

In addition, the Assistant Secretary will be responsible for coordination of Federal programs of financial assistance to students at the undergraduate and the graduate and professional levels. Such coordination is essential to reduce the complexity of information on the various specialized scholarship, fellowship, and loan programs conducted by other Federal agencies, and to provide to the greatest extent possible common conditions and criteria for eligibility, application, award, and administration. The Assistant Secretary will also be responsible for administration of the vorious authorities which provide categorical program support for postsecondary institutions to achieve stated objectives.

Analytic activities should concentrate on the distribution of opportunities in postsecondary education, on how students respond to those opportunities and on a range of issues relating t othe extent to which Federal student financial assistance fosters the continuing vitality of postsecondary institutions, including 2-year community colleges, 4-year public and private colleges and graduate-level research institutions and programs. Thus, an important function of the Assistant Secretary's Office will be to evaluate the impact of these and other Federal programs on the various sectors of postsecondary education and to identify problems in their administration (including measurement of the burdens of Federal programs and regulations).

The committee also suggests that a director for community colleges report directly to the Assistant Secretary. Because community colleges now constitute a major segment of postsecondary education, such a representative should have direct access to this Assistant Secretary.

OFFICE OF OCCUPATIONAL, ADULT AND COMMUNITY EDUCATION

The creation of the Office of Occupational, Adult and Community Education, headed by an Assistant Secretary, will provide needed visibility, representation, and effective administration for Federal vocational, adult, and community education assistance to the State and local programs, which constitute many times the magnitude of Federal efforts in this field.

Today, over 15 million American children are involved in vocational education. Youth with more education who have less work experience are found to earn substantially more than their counterparts with less education. Adult literacy goes hand in hand with job stability and income continuity. Yet less than 5 percent of adults eligible for basic and secondary education receive serious services.

Because Americans have more leisure time due to advancing technology, education is needed to prepare our citizens for several jobs during their lifetimes. Studies show more than 75 percent of adults in the United States are interested in some form of continuing education. The elderly, and women, especially, seek new educational opportunities.

Schools increasingly are becoming important vehicles for the delivery of services to citizens by using valuable school facilities and costly educational services efficiently with related community services, yet less than 10 percent of the 16,000 American school districts have opened the schools to recreation and community services use. These schools which have opened their doors to the community are involving the people of that community in a total educational program. These schools offer recreation, public health, nutrition education, and other services to citizens of all ages and special services to the handicapped. They are put into round-the-clock service where local communities determine the needs that exist. Thus, community education programs and full use of schools by the community reduce taxpayer costs and promote increased community involvement.

The creation of this Office will provide the necessary administrative structure capable of assisting States and localities in delivering effective education and training and adult community services. The Office will be expected to be involved in perceiving changing trends in education and administering programs which prepare inidviduals for continuous education throughout their working lifetimes.

At the Federal level, this Office will effect a partnership between education programs with occupational outcomes in the Department of Education and manpower utilization programs with significant training components in the Department of Labor. While youth education and employment constitute a primary focus of the work of this Office, preparation of adults and older Americans for access to education and work would be a priority mission as well.

At the State and local levels, this Office will provide programmatic assistance in achieving a blend of vocational, adult, and community education programs. This blend, in turn, will help to attract, retain, and serve private sector economic enterprise, to improve the quality of life and to coordinate education and work programs. With its focus on concrete skills and performances, the Office will promote exchanges between the schools and the larger community through provisions of grants to States and localities and by dissemination of the exemplary programs currently under development or in operation.

The Office will also serve to promote confidence in and access to the schools by the policymakers and the citizens of each community. The committee notes that respected national population surveys record more than half the Nation as believing we spend too little on education but indicating as well that confidence in school personnel has declined in recent years. With declining enrollments, surplus facilities, and strained resources affecting the long-term prospects for effective American education, the mission of this Office will be to chart the most cost-beneficial, community-responsive link between education and occupation, on the one hand, and school and community, on the other.

The Office's programs would have a fiscal 1979 authorization of over $725 million and would utilize a staff of approximately 236.

In light of the creation of this new Office, the existing functions of the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education would be located within it and the present Bureau would be abolished. Thus, the new Office would administer the programs now being administered by the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education. These programs would include those relating to manpower training and development, technical training, and other functions concerned with vocational, occupational, adult, and continuing education. The community schools and community education programs presently located in the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education would be established prominently within the new Office to be concerned with school-community linkages and would administer and coordinate programs authorized or mandated in a wide range of associated legislation.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

S. 991 establishes an Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services within the Department to be administered by an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. The bill transfers the Rehabilitation Services Administration (RSA) and the Office for Handicapped Individuals (OHI) to the new Department. It consolidates these entities with the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped (BEH). BEH is part of the Education Division of HEW and is being transferred in section 301 of the bill.

The Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services would administer functions presently administered by the Commissioner of RSA under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and functions administered by BEH under the Education of the Handicapped Act. In addition, it would administer OHI which was authorized by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 but is not presently administered by the Commissioner, and it will administer the Randolph-Sheppard vending facility program, which is administered by the Commissioner of RSA but was not authorized by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

The new Office will not administer vocational rehabilitation services for social security disability beneficiaries, vocational rehabilitation services for supplemental security income beneficiaries, or the developmental disability programs.

The legislation provides for the transfer to the Office of the following functions:

Rehabilitation Services Administration

RSA is presently located in the Office for Human Development Services within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. The basic purpose of the vocational rehabilitation programs which RSA administers is to provide a comprehensive program of rehabililitative services for physically and mentally handicapped persons whose disability substantially impedes employment, but who can reasonably be expected to benefit in terms of employability from these vocational rehabilitation services.

There are essentially six program areas that are administered by RSA and are being transferred into the new Department. The program areas are: Basic State grants, innovation and expansion, service projects, research, training, and the Randolph-Sheppard vending facility program.

Basic State grants for rehabilitation services.—The Federal Government provides grants to States to provide the vocational rehabilitation services needed by handicapped individuals to enter into or return to the world of employment. The grants are used to provide the following services: Counseling, referral, placement, vocational and training services, interpreter and reader services, rehabilitation teaching, tools and equipment, transportation, technological aids, construction of rehabilitation facilities, and recruitment/training.

This program constitutes the bulk of RSA's programing responsibility. It receives by far the largest portion of RSA's total budget.

Innovation and expansion.—This program provides State vocational rehabilitation agencies with limited risk capital to try innovation and expansion activities and services which would have significant impact on the vocational rehabilitation of severely handicapped individuals.

Service projects.—This program includes various special service projects which aim at improving the ability of the severely handicapped to work in very specific areas. The projects are: Project and program evaluation, projects with industry, grants for construction of rehabilitation facilities, technical assistance, vocational training services, facility improvement, special projects for the severely handicapped, handicapped migratory agricultural and seasonal farmworkers, Helen Keller National Center for Deaf-Blind Youths and Adults, and client assistance projects.

Research.—This program heading includes two projects.

The first is international research and training activities. Project grants are made to international and domestic public and nonprofit agencies and organizations, and, to a large extent, institutions of higher learning. The grants go toward developing and applying new knowledge to improve the quality of services to the handicapped, leading to maximum participation in gainful employment.

The second project is rehabilitation research. In this case the grants go toward developing new and innovative methods of applying the most advanced medical technology, scientific achievement, and psychological and social knowledge to solve rehabilitation problems and develop new methods of providing rehabilitation services.

Training.—Project grants are directly awarded to State vocational rehabilitation agencies and other public or nonprofit agencies and organizations, again to a large extent to institutions of higher learning, to provide academic and inservice training in a broad range of rehabilitation professions which contribute to the vocational rehabilitation of the severely physically and mentally disabled.

Randolph-Sheppard vending facility program.—This program is supported by cooperative use of State-Federal vocational rehabilitation funds to pay for staff, vending facility equipment, day-to-day management services, et cetera, to provide employment opportunities for licensed blind vendors on Federal and other property.

Bureau of Education for the Handicapped

BEH is presently located in the Office of Education within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It is the principal agency for administering and carrying out programs and projects relating to the education and training of the handicapped as authorized by the Education of the Handicapped Act, and the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975.

There are essentially seven program areas administered by BEH which are being transferred into the Department. These program areas are: State assistance; special population programs; regional vocational, adult, and postsecondary programs; innovation and development; media and resource services; special education manpower development; and special studies.

State assistance.—Under this general program heading are three more specific projects. The first is the State grant program. The Education for All Handicapped Children Act provides that all handicapped children must be provided educational and related services that are free, appropriate, and individualized. To assist States and outlying areas in meeting the mandate of this act, this program makes grants to help defray excess costs associated with the education of handicapped children at the preschool, elementary, and secondary levels.

The second program concerns funding of deaf-blind centers. This program aims at helping deaf-blind children achieve their full potential for communication and adjustment within society. The program supports regional centers which provide educational and therapeutic services, medical diagnosis and evaluation, and family counseling to deaf-blind children and their families.

The third program is preschool incentive grants. This program seeks to stimulate State and local education agencies to develop and expand educational services to handicapped preschool children, aged 3 to 5, by providing grants to States based on the number of children being served.

Special population programs.—There are two projects contained within this program heading. One of these is the severely handicapped project. Contracts are competitively awarded to State departments of special education, intermediate and local school districts, institutions of higher education, and other public and nonprofit private agencies, to establish and promote programmatic practices designed to meet the educational and training needs of severely handicapped children and youth, in order to make them independent.

The second project is early childhood education. This project awards grants and contracts to provide models for the delivery of educational services to preschool handicapped children.

Regional vocational, adult, and postsecondary programs.—This program provides assistance to publicly supported educational institutions to promote the development and operation of specially designed or modified programs that offer vocational, technical, postsecondary, and adult educational opportunities for handicapped persons.

Innovation and development.—Grants are made to improve educational opportunities for handicapped children under this program. It supports research and development activities to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the educational system for these children through research into critical issues, the development, validation, and dissemination of alternative approaches to problems specific to the education of the handicapped.

Media and resource services.—There are three projects grouped under this heading. Media services and captioned films supports grants and contracts to State and local education agencies, institutions of higher learning, and other public and nonprofit private agencies, to help provide handicapped learners with special educational materials.

Another project is the establishment of regional resource centers which offer training for personnel in special education skills, technical assistance in the development of State plans to serve the handicapped, direct referral services, and assistance to local educational agencies and State educational agencies in adopting models of multidisciplinary referral education services.

The last project under this program heading is recruitment and information. Its purpose is to support the dissemination of information about available programs, services, and resources for the education of handicapped children and to provide referral services to parents, teachers, and other interested groups seeking to appropriate educational programs for their children. In addition, recruitment efforts are funded to encourage people to enter the field of special education.

Special education manpower development.—Annual grants are made, under this program, to State education agencies and institutions of higher education to assist them in developing and improving training programs for educational personnel for the handicapped.

Special studies.—These special studies are mandated to measure and evaluate the provision by States to all handicapped children of a free, public, and appropriate education as required by the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 and to enable the Commissioner of Education to respond to the legislative requirement to annually assess the implementation, impact, and effectiveness of the law. These studies can be conducted by the Commissioner directly or by grant or contract.

Office for Handicapped Individuals

OHI was provided for by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. That act authorized the Secretary of HEW to provide a central clearinghouse for information and resource availability for handicapped individuals through the evaluation of systems within HEW, other departments and agencies of the Federal Government, public and private agencies and organizations, and other sources which provide information and data regarding the location, provision, and availability of education services and training programs for handicapped individuals.

The committee believes that with the transfer of RSA and BEH to the new Department the resource availability, data collection, and informaiton which OHI could draw on in HEW, as addressed by the Rehabilitation Act, will no longer be in HEW. The primary services for the handicapped as they relate to education will be in the Department of Education. The ties the Office for Handicapped Individuals has with RSA and BEH will be severed if it is left in the Department of Health and Welfare. The committee recognized the necessity of maintaining these ties and therefore transferred the Office for Handicapped Individuals, and its functions, to the new Department to be consolidated with RSA and BEH in the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services.

Committee analysis

After analyzing the programs which RSA and BEH administer, the committee believes it makes good administrative sense to consolidate these two agencies, with OHI, within one Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services in the Department of Education.

The committee realized an opportunity to make an organizational change in the existing fragmented programs that can initiate the development of a comprehensive national policy for the education of the handicapped.

There are several reasons the committee believes the vocational rehabilitation programs administered by RSA should be joined with the programs administered by BEH in the Office of Special Education within the Department.

The first reason is that there is a natural relationship between the programs BEH and RSA administer. An examination of the foregoing program descriptions will indicate that both entities have as their common mission improving the ability of handicapped individuals to adapt to society. The committee believes this relationship should be strengthened and that there should be a smooth transition between the general schooling a handicapped child obtains and the vocational education that same individual receives when he or she decides what type of career or vocation to pursue.

The committee also determined there is a significant overlap in the individuals served by BEH and RSA. Although BEH primarily educates children, a significant portion of its programing responsibilities trains adults who in turn train handicapped people. Programs such as the special education manpower development project illustrate this point. In addition, BEH administers programs which counsel the families of handicapped individuals. The regional vocational, adult, and postsecondary programs further illustrate the various age groups served by the programs BEH administers. On the other hand, RSA does not restrict itself to one age group either. It also trains nonhandicapped individuals of any age who in turn train handicapped individuals.

The committee believes placing vocational rehabilitation programs in the same office with programs concerned with the general education of the handicapped would—whether that general education is achieved through direct training of the handicapped or through the training of individuals to teach the handicapped—provide a continuum of habilitative services for the handicapped from birth through adulthood, as Senator Randolph, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on the Handicapped, has suggested in a letter to the committee dated May 12, 1978.

Another reason the committee favors placing vocational rehabilitation and the programs BEH administers in one office within the Department of Education is because the focus of these programs is educational. These programs emphasize training. Training is directly related to educational concerns. Moreover, their overall goal is to improve the ability of handicapped individuals to adapt to society. The committee believes this goal is one which the Department of Education will be broad enough to encompass.

Further, it is the committee's determination the goal of helping to make handicapped individuals become productive, to live with the same independence and dignity of nonhandicapped individuals, is much more compatible with the concerns of education than it is with health and welfare. Handicapped individuals have special needs for services and benefits regardless of income. Education has traditionally made as one of its goals the delivery of services and benefits regardless of income. Health and welfare, on the other hand, as they will exist in the Department of Health and Welfare, will deliver services and benefits on the basis of economic status. Thus the committee believes the Department of Education will better be able to meet the needs of the handicapped as they relate to education.

Another factor the committee took into consideration in coming to the conclusion the vocational rehabilitation programs should be transferred and joined with both OHI and the programs administered by BEH is the significant number of States, 17, that presently administer their vocational rehabilitation programs from their educational agencies. This illustrates the proven compatibility between vocational rehabilitation and education.

While recognizing this existing compatability, it is not the intention of the committee to mandate that any State must administer its vocational rehabilitation programs from its education agency. Therefore, the committee added language to the bill which clearly states that nothing in section 208 shall be construed to require any particular organizational structure of vocational rehabilitation at the State level.

During its deliberations on this issue the committee learned of widespread support for the transfer of RSA and its consolidation with BEH in the Department from Senator Randolph, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on the Handicapped, the Council for Exceptional Children, the National Federation of the Blind, the American Coalition of Citizens with Disabilities (made up of 75 organizations), the National Rehabilitation Association and the State Administrators of Vocational Rehabilitation.

In conclusion, the committee believes the natural relationship which exists between the programs administered by RSA and those administered by BEH, and the relationship between both of these entities and OHI, merit their consolidation in one office. The committee further believes the focus of these programs is more compatible with the goals of education than with health and welfare. Therefore, the committee realized an opportunity to elevate the status, further the goals, and improve the coordination of the programs concerned with educating the handicapped by placing the Office for Handicapped Individuals, the Rehabilitation Services Administration, and the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped in one Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services within the Department of Education.

CHILD NUTRITION

The committee gave careful consideration to the transfer of the school lunch and related child nutrition programs from the Department of Agriculture, where they presently reside, to the new Department of Education.

Two days of hearings were held on the proposed transfer (March 20 and May 8). The nearly 20 witnesses who appeared before the committee represented a broad spectrum of school food service professionals, school administrators, nutritionists, and agricultural producers.

The importance of nutrition in our schools was formally recognized by the Congress in 1946 with the passage of the National School Lunch Act. Over the years, more child nutrition programs were added, and the Federal commitment now stands at nearly $3 billion annually. Today, the school lunch programs are universally available to all the Nation's schoolchildren.

USDA's Food and Nutrition Service presently operates five child feeding programs which will be transferred to the Department: school lunch, school breakfast, special milk, child care food, and summer food service. They are administered and funded through State education agencies, and provide cash assistance to enable schools and institutions to establish, maintain, or expand food service for children. USDA also buys surplus agriculture commodities for distribution to and use in school dining facilities.

The committee believes the child nutrition programs fit closely into place with the overall mission of the Department of Education. The new Department will be concerned with youth and their proper development as individuals. Good nutrition is integrally related to our children's growth and learning. Many studies demonstrate that a hungry or malnourished child does not learn or develop well. USDA Assistant Secretary for Food and Consumer Services Carol Foreman Consumer Services Carol Foreman told the committee:

> This important component of the new Department will represent a clear Federal statement that the responsibility to educate and develop our Nation's children extends beyond the classroom to a wide range of children's needs.

The school feeding programs operate entirely within the context of the school facility and the schoolday. They are as important a function of our schools as lessons, desks, or textbooks. The delivery system for these programs is the educational system. All of the school feeding programs are administered by the State departments of education. The Secretary of Education will be the Federal official who will have direct daily contact with that educational system. Because the Department of Education will be close to the educational delivery system, the programs can be expected to operate more efficiently.

Location of child nutrition programs in the Department of Education will help, most importantly, in forming a uniform administrative chain between Federal, State, and local governments. USDA's data and accounting requirements, funding cycles, compliance procedures, and eligibility standards all differ significantly from those for Federal education programs presently administered by the U.S. Office of Education. The result is burdensome paperwork and redtape for State and local education agencies. According to the Council of Chief State School Officers, the two Federal agencies requiring the most duplicative and time-consuming paperwork are USDA and OE. These top State education officials, who have primary responsibility for the administration of child nutrition programs at the State level, feel the transfer would result in beneficial savings in time and money.

Parallel administration of school nutrition programs on Federal, State, and local levels will foster coordination and standardization. Of all the Federal agencies and programs affecting education, both USDA and OE have the greatest impact and involvement. Placing their school programs under the same umbrella will increase the opportunities for the Secretary of Education to uncover duplication and waste in regulations and paperwork, and correct them.

In their 30-year history at USDA, the school feeding programs have not always fared well. Several administrations have attempted to undercut the programs in response to pressures from powerful agricultural producer interests, which often dominate in USDA. In the past, nutritionists have criticized the influence of "agribusiness" over the programs. In a major report to Congress last year by the General Accounting Office, "How Good Are School Lunches?"—a shortcoming in the performance of the school lunch program revealed by the GAO is the "conflict between the program's agricultural and nutritional provisions." The GAO also concluded the agricultural considerations that retard the school lunch program's nutritional effectiveness "appear to adversely affect student participation." While the current leadership of USDA has given strong support for these programs, the Department of Education can provide a more stable location for the programs.

Transferring child nutrition programs to the Department of Education offers the chance to give nutrition more attention at the Federal level. The Committee believes the creation of the Office of Child Nutrition, headed by an Assistant Secretary, in the new Department will go far towards building in an institutional guarantee for strengthening the relationship between education and nutrition. The Assistant Secretary for Child Nutrition will be a position of strength and of advocacy within the executive branch.

Locating the child nutrition programs in the Education Department will facilitate coordination with other programs having nutrition components. The Congressional Research Service has identified more than 15 programs in the Office of Education which have significant nutrition responsibilities. Included are titles I and IV of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, vocational education, consumer education, environmental education, and community education.

The committee believes the Department of Education will provide a sound base for the child nutrition programs. While some may argue educators are not receptive to nutrition programs in the schools, the facts tell a different story:

> Today, the school lunch program is available to more than 90 percent of all children in the United States.
> While the total number of U.S. schools has dropped nearly 40 percent since the program's inception in 1946, the number of schools participating in the programs has doubled.
> The number of children served by the programs has increased from 6 million in 1946 to more than 25 million today.

These figures indicate the success of the school feeding programs in our schools—rates that could not have been achieved without the encouragement and support of the education community. To date, the chief State school officials from the States of Washington, Georgia, Tennessee, Minnesota, Illinois, New York, Delaware, Alaska, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Michigan, South Carolina, New Hampshire, North Dakota, North Carolina, Wisconsin, Colorado, California, Nevada, Iowa, Utah, Wyoming, Hawaii, Alabama, and West Virginia, and also the top education officials of Puerto Rico and Guam, have communicated to the committee their strong support for school feeding programs and for their inclusion in the new Department. Further, the major national educational organizations are on record in favor of expanding the child nutrition programs and including them in the new Department.

The committee further feels the transfer of these programs will not affect the distribution of surplus agricultural commodities to the schools. It has recommended all authority and funding for the commodity program remain in USDA. Commodities will continue to be bought and shipped by two agencies in USDA: the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, and the Food Safety and Quality Service. To insure the needs of schools are considered in the commodity selection process, the legislation requires the Secretaries of Education and of Agriculture to consult with each other on the preferences of the Nation's schools for variety and quality in commodities. The committee is aware of recent reports of hard-to-use commodities—such as peanut lard or cranberry sauce—being oversupplied to many schools. Also of concern are the reports of the poor quality of some commodities received by the schools. There should be genuine and serious attempts made by both Departments to adequately meet the needs of schools in providing nutritious and balanced meals.

Coordination between the Department of Education and the Department of Agriculture will not become more difficult by the transfer of these programs. Presently in USDA, there are three different agencies involved in commodity support to the child nutrition programs—each operating separately and distinctly from the other. The new Office of Child Nutrition in the Education Department will simply assume the responsibility, now held by the parent agency in USDA, the Food and Nutrition Service, for providing information on the preferences of the schools to the two agencies which purchase commodities. The committee fully expects the relationships which now exist between FNS and the two commodity agencies already in USDA will carry over to the new Office of Child Nutrition in the Department of Education. This arrangement will resemble the relationship between HEW's Administration on Aging and USDA, where USDA now successfully purchases and transports surplus commodities to institutions which participate in the nutrition program for the elderly, but where primary operational and policy responsibility rests with HEW.

The transfer will not harm links between the programs and nutritional research functions in USDA. In fact, the child nutrition programs really have little to do with USDA's research capabilities. For example, it wasn't until this year—the first time since 1946—that USDA began to draw upon its nutrition research and start to suggest changes in the basic meals patterns for school lunches. These research functions in behalf of child nutrition programs currently comprise only a handful of person-years and can and should continue to be made available to these programs after their transfer. USDA now undertakes more research for programs outside that Department. Further, there are other Federal agencies conducing nutrition research, and the committee believes the child nutrition programs would benefit from their assistance. One of the most active is the National Institutes of Health. The committee is directing that the Department of Agriculture as well as other Federal agencies to make available their expertice to the Secretary of Education and the Assistant Secretary for Child Nutrition.

USDA's ability to effectively develop a workable food and nutrition policy will not be hindered by the transfer. The Committee believes the transfer of child nutrition programs to the Department of Education will not affect the basic mission of USDA, and should not be interpreted as a diminution of that Department. School feeding programs are no more central to the development of food and nutrition policy than are Armed Forces feeding operations, or cafeterias overseen by the General Services Administration. Almost $7 billion worth of nutrition programs will remain in USDA after the school lunch transfer, including nutrition research, food inspection, the Extension Service, domestic food assistance programs such as food stamps, and overseas food donation programs.

USDA will continue to be a strong Cabinet Department. The child nutrition transfer involves less than 1 percent of USDA's total staff. Budgetwise, USDA will be larger than six Cabinet Departments after the transfer, and equal in size to the new Department of Education. The Department of Agriculture will continue to be the "lead" agency in the Federal Government for food and agriculture.

The committee believes the Department of Education should have a strong nutrition education component. With increasing reports of more plate waste in the schools and the rising popularity of nonnutritional foods, the importance of nutrition education and better dietary awareness becomes critical. Traditionally, USDA has been reluctant to encourage States and localities to develop nutrition education in their schools. A Department of Education will be in a better position to develop and encourage nutrition education. The Department will encourage the development and dissemination to the schools of curriculums which deal with nutrition education and other life sciences.

Last year, Congress provided for a new, $27 million nutrition education program in the Child Nutrition Amendments (Public Law 95–166), where the Federal Government would encourage States and localities, through their State education agencies, to develop their own nutrition education efforts. The committee believes this program should be transferred to the Department of Education, which will have expertise in developing and recommending effective nutrition education strategies, curriculums, and information dissemination. The Nation's schools will be better able to broadly disseminate a successful nutrition education effort. The Education Department will be more familiar than USDA with the needs of the schools, and will be in a better position to expand our children's knowledge of nutrition.

The committee also believes the transfer of the nutrition education program will complement and supplement the large nutrition education efforts already ongoing in the HEW Education Division. The Congressional Research Service has identified the following programs in the Office of Education which have nutrition education components: consumer and homemaking education, vocational education, occupational home economics, adult education, school health and nutrition services for low-income families, centers and services for blind-deaf children, and programs for the education of handicapped children.

Finally the committee believes the transfer of child nutrition programs is important to the creation of an effective Department of Education. One important reason for establishing the new Department is that existing fragmented and scattered Federal education effort is in need of real consolidation. The present situation is one where the Nation's school officials are forced to go from agency to agency in the Federal Government to piece together their financial assistance package. USDA and the Office of Education supply most of the Federal aid that goes to our schools.

They also impose the most time-consuming, costly regulations and paperwork. A Federal Department of Education should, as much as possible, encompass the programs that primarily support our schools. Education is a broad activity which should not be limited solely to the classroom. Nutrition and school lunches are on important part of the school day, and the educational experience. Our students will benefit from the inclusion of USDA's child nutrition programs in the Department of Education.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE OVERSEAS DEPENDENTS SCHOOLS

The committee recommends the transfer of the Department of Defense (DOD) overseas dependents schools system to the new Department of Education, and believes their inclusion in the Department will allow for the improvement of the education of their students.

As the American role in world affairs grew after the Second World War, so did the need for providing a quality education for the dependents of military personnel stationed overseas. Today, there are 267 DOD dependents schools scattered across 24 different foreign countries serving approximately 135,000 students. The fiscal year 1979 budget estimate for the Schools is $307 million. Altogether, about 10,000 employees are involved in the school system.

Unfortunately, the DOD schools have never been fully statutorily authorized. In the more than 30 years of their "temporary" existence, the DOD schools' authorization has been contained in appropriations bills—normally less than a paragraph of legislative language. Direction and guidance from the Congress has come in the form of detailed committee reports.

The committee believes more attention and oversight is needed for this important school system. S. 991 provides, for the first time, a workable legislative base upon which to build. The legislation establishes an Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children, to be headed by a high-level Administrator who will report directly to the Secretary of Education.

The schools will represent a major responsibility of the Department of Education. If located within the continental United States, the system would rank as the 12th largest among the Nation's public school districts. The quality of the schools should improve and prosper in the new environment.

The committee finds that the primary purpose and goals of the DOD schools are more in line with those of the Department of Education than the Department of Defense. Obviously, the primary mission of the Defense Department is not education. The schools' budgets are considered along with the rest of the DOD budget, where often there is a limited understanding of the intricacies of operating so large a school system. Although the immediate staff of the DOD schools is made up of professional educators, the top officials in DOD normally have little or no expertise in the field of education. The Department of Education, in contrast, will be the Federal agency having direct contact with in American education.

The DOD schools do not prepare its students necessarily for any purposes related to the military. The schools are regular American public and elementary public schools, serving children from kindergarten through high school. The expertise and research findings in education will be more readily accessible in the Education, not the Defense Department.

Further, the DOD schools should not, by any means, be isolated from the rest of American education. Locating the schools in the Department of Education would help ease the transition of its students to the public schools in the continental United States. There is considerable movement between the DOD and the American public schools. Terms of duty for most military personnel average about 3 years overseas. It is both necessary and desirable to provide a sense of continuity for students going from one system to another. The Department of Education will be more attuned to the ever-changing trends in American education, and provide the Administrator of the overseas schools valuable assistance in sensing, adjusting, and responding to these trends.

The committee expects the Secretary of Education will use his or her powers to make available to the schools the vast educational resources in the new Department. The Schools should be allowed to participate in a wide range of education programs not now open to them. The Secretary should make strong efforts to encourage the participation of the DOD Schools in school nutrition programs, vocational education programs, services for the education of the handicapped and gifted children, library and academic facilities improvement, research functions, and other programs which would benefit the Schools.

The transfer of the DOD schools should be conducted with a minimum of disruption. The legislation provides for a 3-year "phase-in" period, during which time the Secretary is required to develop a comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer. The continued efficient operation of the schools is very important, and will require a careful analysis before the transfer plan is actually designed and executed. During the transition period, the committee is directing the Secretary of Education and the Secretary of Defense to work closely and harmoniously to assure a smooth transfer of the schools and avoid any disruption to or deterioration of the education programs conducted in the schools. Section 505(a) insures the agreements between the schools' present administration and the Armed Forces in existence at the time the Department of Education is established shall remain in effect until new agreements are negotiated as part of the planned transfer.

The committee believes the reorganization of the DOD schools which is currently underway should continue, and should not be disrupted during the transition period.

As the Secretary develops the plan for transfer of the schools, the committee is directing that such plan shall include recommendations for increasing parent, student, educator, military, and school administrator participation in the operation of the schools. The committee is concerned with the lack of a responsive, decentralized method in running the schools. The committee suggests the Secretary investigate the practicality and feasibility of the creation of an advisory board or commission, made up of parents, students, educators, school administrators, and the military, which could assume some measure of input over operation and policy responsibilities for the school system. Such a board would facilitate logistical support by including military personnel as members to insure cooperation by the various armed services and the local base commander. The board could act as an effective insulator to minimize the direct involvement in the future of the Secretary in the schools. And, the board would provide real opportunities for guaranteeing that parents, students, educators, school administrators, and military personnel would have substantial input in the policies of their schools, much in the same way State or local boards of education do in the continental United States.

The committee feels the transfer of the DOD schools to the Department of Education will broaden the scope of the Department, improve the quality of the schools, and most importantly, improve the quality of education for students who attend the schools. The Federal Government has a clear obligation to provide an education of equal or superior quality for the dependents of military personnel.

INDIAN EDUCATION

S. 991 provides for the consolidation of Federal Indian education functions and programs in a new Office of Indian Education in the Department of Education. The new Office would be headed by an Assistant Secretary for Indian Education.

Presently, two different Federal agencies have significant responsibilities for educating Indian students. The Bureau of Indian Affairs operates an extensive education effort for American Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. Altogether, the BIA oversees some 220 elementary and secondary schools and three post secondary institutions serving over 50,000 Indian students at a cost of more than $162 million in 1978. In addition, the BIA has large grant programs for aid to public schools serving Indian people ($35 million) and for continuing education ($41 million). The Office of Indian Education in HEW's Office of Education also administers programs that give aid to public schools serving Indian students, and awards funds for special projects in elementary, secondary, and adult education. The total budget for this Office is approximately $60 million in 1978. It is important to note, also, that OE contributes large amounts of money to public school systems—more than $120 million in 1978—for educating Indian students under two primary grant programs: impact aid and ESEA grants for disadvantaged students. OE also contributes about $25 million per year for higher education assistance. Consequently, the total Federal aid to Indian edudcation is more than $500 million annually, split nearly evenly between HEW and BIA.

The legislation would transfer all education functions of the BIA to the new Office of Indian Education in the Education Department. Also, all functions of the Indian Education Office now in OE would be transferred to the new Office.

Generally, the committee believes the overriding reason for the consolidation is the disturbingly poor condition of Indian education. It progresses at a snail's pace under the BIA and OE. Achievement rates of Indian students are much lower than those of other American students. Today, more than 50 percent of Indian students entering elementary school will have dropped out by the time they reach secondary school. At the post secondary level, the Indian dropout rates exceed 75 percent. The quality of both BIA and public schools on or near reservations is extremely poor in most cases.

The Federal Government is obligated, legally and morally, to provide Indian people educational services of equal quality to those afforded other American citizens. But the BIA has a poor record of providing quality educational services to Indian people.

A review of the history of the past performance of the BIA will reveal little justification for leaving education programs in that agency. Education has not been a priority at the BIA for the last 100 years. The Bureau has institutional deficiencies which thwart the administration and development of an effective Indian education effort. Education is only one of several BIA area office functions and responsibilities. BIA area directors are often able to reprogram education funds to other unrelated uses. Many do not view education as an important responsibility. In the BIA organizational setup, the area directors report to the Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs. The BIA Director of Education, based in Washington, has no authority over area directors.

The primary mission of either the Department of the Interior or the Bureau of Indian Affairs is not education. The internal budget processes of both the BIA and the Department have treated harshly Indian education in the past. There has been a discouraging lack of involvement of Indian people by the BIA in either budget considerations or long-term planning.

The committee also finds that the fragmentation of Federal Indian education programs between two agencies inhibits the development of a comprehensive strategy for Indian education. There is little, if any, coordination between the BIA and OE. The persisting poor condition of Indian education necessitates a cohesive remedial policy on the Federal level.

Further, this fragmentation means there is no, one high-ranking official in the Federal government who speaks for Indian education, or who has the clout to tackle these tough problems and challenges. Presently, there exists a Deputy Commissioner for Indian Education in OE, and a Director of Education in BIA. Both are submerged in their bureaucracies, and their voices cannot be strong. The job is particularly frustrating in the BIA, where there has been rapid turnover in the position of BIA Director of Education. Since 1966, the overall average length of tenure of the BIA Director has been just 9 months. Through the creation of the post of Assistant Secretary of Indian Education in the new Department of Education, one individual could focus in on the crucial problems still ahead in Indian education, and with this high-level position, individuals with high qualifications would be attracted to fill such an important slot.

The committee is concerned about reports that Indian people still have little influence or control over their education. Increased local control is vital to the success of Indian education. Indian representation on public school boards has been slow to develop. Under the BIA, fewer than 35 tribes have contacted with the BIA for school operations. The Bureau has slowly implemented the congressionally mandated policy of Indian self-determination in education. The committee feels strongly a major objective of the new Office of Indian Education in the Department of Education should be increased local control of Indian education by Indian people.

Postsecondary educational assistance to American Indians, Alaskan natives, and Aleuts needs more direction and development. Although some real gains have been made in recent years, still a disproportionately large number of Indian people do not go on to some form of higher education. In addition, the disturbingly high dropout rates indicate the BIA postsecondary education programs are poorly run. Transfer to the Department of Education should provide for a stronger, coordinated focus on Indian higher education problems and programs.

Of major importance is for the Department of Education to recognize the unique and special needs of American Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. The committee is directing the new Department to recognize and respect the special legal relationship—the trust responsibility—which exists between the Federal Government and Indian tribes. The committee believes the creation of the new Office of Indian Education in the Department of Education will strengthen the trust responsibility. The prevalence of socioeconomic and educational disadvantage among Indians make the provision of adequate services by the Federal Government vital.

In our consideration of the legislation, the committee actively solicited the comments and input of more than 350 Indian tribes and organizations across the country. The legislation, as reported, goes far towards meeting nearly all of the Indian community's concerns.

Specifically, the bill sets up a distinct, tangible office within the Department devoted solely to the special concerns of Indian education. The Office and its Presidentially appointed Assistant Secretary will report directly to the Secretary of Education. Both will be on an equal footing with other educational interests in the new Department. The existing BIA education programs will be specifically transferred to the new Office, and will not be "lost" in the Department.

The legislation stipulates the transfer of Indian education programs to the Department of Education will not alter the trust responsibility. Again, the Department and the Secretary of Education are expected to recognize their special, legal, and unique requirements to meet the needs of Indian people. They are bound by law to respect the trust responsibility. The committee will be carefully monitoring the Department of Education's adherence to the trust responsibility.

The transfer of Indian education functions will not change the existing eligibility standards for both the BIA and the OE programs. Presently, the BIA serves only Indian tribes recognized officially by the Federal government. OE uses the same eligibility standard for its impact aid programs, but for other programs uses one that is much broader, and often includes Indians not federally recognized. While the committee sees the need for tightening the definition of "Indian" used by OE, it is not in our jurisdiction or our field of expertise to make a substantive policy change. The legislation forbids the changing of either definition by the transfer. The committee believes the issue of how to define an "Indian" is better left to the Indian people and the authorizing committees in Congress to decide. The committee expects the transferred BIA programs will continue to service federally recognized tribes exclusively.

The new Office of Indian Education will be governed by existing Indian preference laws in the hiring of its employees. The committee expects the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education will go to great lengths to promote Indian preference in the Office's programs and services, which would go a long way towards instituting more Indian control over Indian education. The Assistant Secretary should make strong efforts to select highly qualified Indian people to fill positions in the Office. The committee is aware of the problems created by sometimes restrictive civil service requirements in federally funded programs affecting Indian people. The Assistant Secretary and the Secretary of Education, in submitting their comprehensive plan for the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts, should make recommendations to Congress for improving the efficiency and effectiveness of personnel in Indian education services operated by the Federal government.

Great care should be taken in the selection of the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education. The committee expects such an individual will be of Indian, Alaska Native, or Aleutian origin. The President, in selecting a person for this important position, should consult widely with Indian tribes and organizations. The Assistant Secretary should have impressive qualifications and much experience in Indian education. The Assistant Secretary should be afforded sufficient latitude in the Department of Education to actively promote the interests of Indian education throughout the entire Department.

The legislation amends the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act to make its provisions fully applicable to the new Department. Self-determination is an important concept to the Indian people. It enables Indian tribes to contract services normally provided directly by the Federal Government and operate them on their own. The committee believes self-determination and the contracting authority are important and critical tools for instituting more local control of education by Indian people. The new Department is expected to cooperate fully with the law and encourage Indian tribes to contract these services. The Department and the Office of Indian Education should make special efforts to assist tribes with the necessary technical assistance to operate these programs. It is important that the contracting authorized under the Self-Determination Act be administered with as few burdensome restrictions as possible. The new Department should make sincere efforts to minimize contracting problems, such as making arrangements to cover startup costs and determine tribal funding needs in advance.

The bill directs the Secretary of Education and the Assistant Secretary to institute more local control of Indian education by Indian people. Primary policy responsibility for schools should reside with the local community. The committee believes the new Department should institute more direct funding of Indian education programs with as few strings as possible. Funds, functions, or programs administered by the Office of Indian Education in the new Department should not be channeled through State education agencies. A direct relationship between the Office and the tribes will result in fewer rules, regulations, and unnecessary paperwork.

S. 991 requires consultation and coordination between the two top Federal Indian officials—the Assistant Secretary of Indian Affairs in BIA, and the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education. The BIA will continue to be the "lead" agency in the Federal Government for Indian affairs. Important trust protection, advocacy, and natural resource functions would stay in the Bureau.

Indian tribes have a unique relationship to civil rights laws, and members of those tribes enjoy a special status. The special Government-to-Government relationship between the Federal Government and the tribes exempts Indians and Indian tribes from certain civil rights restrictions. Indian preference in personnel actions, for example, is based on this special relationship. At the same time, Indians as citizens are entitled to the protection of the civil rights statutes. The committee believes this special dual status requires a special expertise, and that the Secretary should consider establishing a separate division for Indian education in the new Department's Office for Civil Rights.

Finally, the legislation provides for a 3-year "phase-in" period for the BIA school system. It is important that the transfer of the operation of these schools to the new Department be conducted with little disruption and much consultation with Indian people. The bill calls for the development of a comprehensive study for effecting the transfer of the schools. The Assistant Secretary for Indian Education should make a strong effort to seek the advice and counsel of Indians, Alaskan natives, and Aleuts and involve them in planning for the transfer. In carrying out the transfer, the committee expects that all support services necessary for the effective and efficient operation of the schools be also transferred, including construction planning and oversight, general planning and evaluation personnel, and other incidental administrative and support personnel.

In conducting the comprehensive study of transfer, the committee directs the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary to fully investigate and report back to Congress the feasibility of and possible proposal for the creation of an advisory Indian education review panel. The committee believes there is a strong need for insuring Indian people's input into Indian education policies and programs at the Federal level. The proposal for an all-Indian board or commission should be developed in full consultation with Indian people and, if recommended, should be established as soon as is practicable. The committee has been impressed with the diligence of effort and expertise of the National Advisory Council on Indian Education, established by the Indian Education Act. NACIE provides a valuable service to the Congress in the form of an effective forum for the exchange of ideas and information. At the present, however, NACIE is primarily charged with advising the OE Office of Indian Education on its programs and services. The committee believes the possibility of using NACIE as the vehicle for advising and reviewing the policies of the entire new Office of Indian Education in the Department of Education should be considered.

The committee has assured all American Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts this proposed consolidation is not a move toward termination of the Federal trust responsibility. The legislation goes far to meet and safeguard their special interests. It is a renewed deep, and sincere effort to improve the quality of Indian education, and ultimately, the quality of life for Indian people. Throughout the findings, purposes, and functions sections of the legislation, the importance of tribal governments and Indian people in the process of education is emphasized. The committee is directing the Department of Education to devote special attention, and a good portion of its resources, to to the needs of Indian students.

SCIENCE EDUCATION

The Department will assume the administration of a number of science education programs presently located within the Science Education Directorate of the National Science Foundation (NSF).

S. 991 insures appropriate placement for the science education programs by transferring them specifically and intact to the Office of Educational Research and Improvement. Within such an organizational structure the science and technology programs would constitute approximately one-fourth of the R. & D. programs categorized and administered by this Office. The committee expects science education to be both a visible and substantial component in the new Department, as well as a special entity which will complement science and technology initiatives supported by the NSF and other science and research agencies.

Transfer of these programs will enable the Department to take an active role in assisting the improvement of the quality of science teaching in schools and in undergraduate postsecondary institutions, as well as in improving public understanding and science literacy among the general public. The Department will assume primary responsibility, not only for the specific science programs transferred, but for the conduct of studies, surveys, and evaluations relating to the quality of science teaching and learning and improved public understanding of science. Dissemination of science curricular materials and teaching practices should become a departmental priority.

A science education unit in the Department is expected to assist in enhancing the quality of school science programs and the quality of teaching and to eliminate unnecessary overlap between education programs supported by NSF and the authorities administered by HEW's Education Division.

The Education Division supports projects worth millions of dollars which deal with science education and curricular development (for example, environmental education, metric education, ESEA, and emergency school aid science and math projects) and supports research relating to teaching subjects including science, math, and the use of instructional technologies. Thus, apart from the NSF science education programs, the Department of Education will administer hundreds of millions of dollars for science-related and mathematics programs. The substantive quality of science and math curricular research and development programs will be assured by the direct involvement and assistance of scientists and science educators who will serve as staff, reviewers and consultants. The success of the Department of Education will depend a good deal on the extent to which scientists, social scientists, university researchers, and academicians participate in the Department's activities. These programs, along with those of science education, are expected to give strong impetus to science education in the new Department.

Declines in science achievement over the past decade have required renewed attention. Achievement in science, as measured by various national surveys and standardized tests, has steadily declined. Many science and mathematics teachers admit to having been inadequately trained. According to the recent report from the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), high school "youths continue their downward trend in science despite the ever-growing demands of a technological society."

A strong commitment to science education will necessitate the placement and support for a strong and visible organizational entity in the Department which concentrates attention and resources on science improvemet. This unit will be located within the Office of Educational Research and Improvement and parallel other major efforts which focus on basic and applied research, postsecondary education improvement, and other program units which report directly to the Assistant Secretary for Research and Improvement.

The NSF programs transferred in the legislation represent approximately $56.3 million out of the entire $77.6 million fiscal year 1979 request) for the Science Education Directorate in NSF and will require the transfer of no more than 90 personnel.

S. 991, as originally introduced, transferred the entire NSF Science Directorate to the Department. S. 991, as reported, is consistent with the President's proposal for reorganization. Only those programs aimed primarily at students and teachers in the elementary and secondary and undergraduate institutions will be transferred to the new Department. The programs which would remain at NSF include those aimed at recruiting and training scientific researchers, those programs requiring direct participation of scientists, and those which provide science information and assistance to citizen groups. The programs transferred are the following:

Teacher training.—These programs are primarily designed to assist in improving and updating the quality of experienced elementary and secondary school or teachers at all levels. Since the early 1950's, these workshops and institute-type programs have been extremely popular among teachers, and in 1979 some 18,000 persons will participate.

Student oriented.—These programs are directed at identifying, teaching, and involving (in laboratory and clinical settings) some of the Nation's most talented high school students In 1979, some 5,000 students will participate in these programs, many of whom will be minorities and females who will receive encouragement to enter scientific fields.

Institutional support.—These programs provide funds for improving institutional facilities and equipment, primarily at 2- and 4-year colleges, including undergraduate colleges which serve blacks and other minority groups.

Science education research and development.—These programs emphasize assistance in developing innovative curricula and technologies and designing science programs for all youths and adults, including those created exclusively for the gifted and talented in preschools, schools, and undergraduate institutions, or in nontraditional settings.

Public understanding of science programs.—These programs are designed to assist in improving the public's understanding of scientific principles and technological content which may be involved in broader public policy and political issues. These public understanding programs rely more on the use of television, radio, and museums than on traditional school programs. For example, Children's Television Workshop, the producer of "Sesame Street," will develop a science education series for children aged 8 to 12 in 1979.

However, certain public understanding of science projects, for example, those requiring a more direct involvement participation of the scientific community, will remain in NSF, as described below.

The transfer of the existing science education programs from the NSF to the Department will not have the effect of amending Public Law 81-507, authorizing the creation of the National Science Foundation and the Science Education Directorate. The NSF will continue to assume responsibility for strengthening scientific research and may initiate new scientific programs and projects which relate to personnel and institutional development and public understanding, when they draw upon the scientific expertise of that agency.

The NSF will maintain its primary educational function by continuing its support for fellowships and traineeships closely associated with graduate and postdoctoral research programs. NSF will also retain responsibility for special graduate fellowships and traineeships for students and faculty in minority institutions and for other efforts which provide support for underrepresented individuals, that is, ethnic minorities, women, handicapped persons, who have the desire and potential to enter scientific and research careers, or to enroll in graduate schools, colleges, and universities to pursue scientific careers. The National Science Foundation will also retain its responsibility for sponsoring basic and fundamental reseach that may relate to education and to human growth and development. Studies in cognitive development, linguistics, and those relating to various social science disciplines will continue to be promoted and funded by the appropriate Directorates within the NSF.

Project activities under the science and society program will continue to be administered in the Foundation, with the exception of certain activities relating to public understanding, which will be a shared responsibility among a number of Federal agencies. The science and society program is intended to bring about greater understanding and improvement to the relationship between the scientific and technological communities and to the larger society. Improving the public's understanding of complex science and technological principles and information often requires the direct involvement and participation of top scientific and technical expertise. As a result, the committee feels the NSF should not be discharged from this set of activities. Much of this effort helps to assure the involvement of the research and academic communities in contemporary debates on public and social policy. This effort provides important assistance to public-interest groups seeking scientific and technical expertise and also examines ethical and value issues in science and technology.

The committee shares the concerns which have been expressed over maintaining the quality and relevance of the content of science education teaching and materias, as well as those relating to general attitudes toward and appreciation of science and the work of scientists. Presently, there is a relatively high degree of public confidence in the abiltiy of scientists and technologists to solve some of society's major problems. The attitude that prevails in our Nation today about the importance of the work of the scientific enterprise and its professionals is due partly to the quality of science teaching and the attitudes toward science which schools and colleges engender.

However, the committee recognizes the problems associated with expressions of distrust and disenchantment, regarding the benefits of technological advancement and scientific research. Improvements in the quality of science programs in schools and educational activities directed to the general public can provide the general public with the background necessary to participate effectively in decisions affecting the work of the scientific communities.

The Department should work closely with NSF and with other scientific agencies, institutions, and associations to improve contacts between the scientific and nonscientific communities and between scientists and professional educators. Assurances in these directions will ultimately lead to improved public understanding of and appreciation for science.

NSF's enabling legislation requires the agency "to evaluate the status and needs of the various sciences as evidenced by programs, projects, and studies undertaken by agencies of the Federal Government," and to evaluate "the research and education programs undertaken or supported by the agencies of the Federal Government." In carrying out these mandates, the NSF should monitor the science-related policies and efforts of the Department of Education, just as it monitors the research and science education programs of other Federal departments and agencies.

Philip M. Smith, Assistant Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, stated his view to the committee on the relationship of NSF to the Department of Education:

> The safeguard is that NSF would retain its current broad statutory authority for support of science education. NSF would complement Department of Education activities by focusing on innovative projects that tap scientific resources to invigorate the content of science education. A Department of Education could therefore provide NSF with new opportunities to initiate innovative and highly experimental activities needing testing prior to their application.[10]

NSF will continue to support basic or fundamental research relating to education and to initiate proposals for research, training, or developmental projects relating to education when it feels such an activity is in the national interest and within the scope of its mission and agency mandate "to promote the progress of science."

The committee urges the Secretary of the new Department and the Director of NSF in consultation with the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy to consider the creation of a special ad hoc committee to prepare immediately a policy guidance memorandum (memorandum of understanding) with respect to the roles of NSF and the Department in supporting science education activities in general and the specific policies and procedures for continuing and/or extending the science education programs transferred from NSF.

A more comprehensive strategy for examining ways to improve science education should also be initiated and prepared by an interagency group of specialists under the direction of the Federal Interagency Committe on Education, and with analytic support from the National Center for Education Statistics. Such a strategy should consider an overall assessment of the quality and availability of resources involved in teaching and communicating scientific information. It should identify the amount and quality of Federal, State, and local resources directed to science education in schools and undergraduate institutions, and most importantly, it should assess the performance of students participating in science educational programs, as well as the levels of science literacy among the general citizenry. Special analysis should account for the extent to which disparities exist among performances of individuals in special groups, demographic areas, or certain educational institutional settings. Analysis of these problems may require outside consultative and evaluation services, commencement of specialized policy studies of previous research findings, and a utilization and interpretation of recent studies and surveys, such as those conducted under the National Assessment for Educational Progress, or for the National Science Board.

Finally, the committee urges the Secretary to make extensive use of scientific talent among the academic and university communities. Limitations of salary and expense (S. & E.) funds often preclude more direct outside participation in planning, budgeting, and evaluation activities. Nevertheless, the committee feels strongly that immediate steps and plans need to be developed by the Secretary to assure the direct and continued involvement of the scientific community in the development of general science-related policies, in specific tasks associated with the evaluation of competitive grant and contract applications, and in the monitoring of ongoing science education projects, institutes, and dissemination efforts.

The participation of both scientists and social scientists should not be limited to the administration and direction of the science education programs transferred from NSF. The Secretary should involve professionals from the academic communities in all program-support activities that relate to scientific teaching and learning, and in all policy planning and developmental activities which would benefit by input from the academic disciplines and from expertise of persons with scientific understanding and methodology skills.

The committee expects the Secretary to make use of provisions of this act which govern appointments and compensation with respect to scientific and technical personnel. A major factor for the success and influence of NSF's science education efforts has been attributed to its strong commitment to the steady rotation of scientists from the field into the agency. Continued use of noncompetitive appointments should be based on highly selective skills or knowledge which may not be available in the agency as well as a general desire to have notable and competent science educators functioning within the agency at all times. Technical assistance to other Federal education program managers and project officers and to other interested groups or individuals concerning science education should be a significant departmental function apart from the funding of programs. Transfer of personnel from NSF to the Department should help to build the nucleus of a cadre of expert science educators. An immediate review of staffing requirements for the science education activities should be undertaken.

Finally, the Secretary should also make note of the committee's concern for the organizational placement of the science programs being transferred. The committee recommends that a supergrade-level person with a strong science background should directly supervise the science program activities.

HUD COLLEGE HOUSING PROGRAM

The committee recommends the transfer of the college housing program, presently administered by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

The college housing program was created by title IV of the Housing Act of 1950, as amended, to assist higher educational institutions, through long-term Federal loans, in the construction, expansion, or rehabilitation of dormitories, dining halls, student unions, infirmaries, and other campus housing. The program's budget for fiscal year 1978 was $111 million. Interest rates for the loans average about 3 percent. More than $3 billion in loans to publicly operated postsecondary educational institutions are still outstanding. For the private institutions participating in the program, nearly $2 billion are outstanding.

Generally, the committee believes the transfer of the HUD college housing program would allow for the development of a consolidated assistance program for construction of higher education facilities. There already exists in the Office of Education the higher education facilities loan and insurance fund, the purpose of which falls into line closely with the college housing program.

The committee further believes it will be important that the present high level of efficiency of operation of the program not be disturbed by the transfer. HUD now uses complex legal agreements and procedures for operating the program, and their transfer should be carried out with a minimum of disruption and burdensome changes. The committee recommends the Department of Education continue to use the services of the Federal Reserve Bank as the fiscal agent for the Department. Coordination between the Department and the FRB should be close and strong during and after the transition period.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

The bill provides for the establishment of an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. Helen Wise, member of the Pennsylvania State House of Representatives, commented that the Department of Education "presents an important opportunity to improve Federal-State and Federal-local relations in education programs and policymaking." She further stated:

> Federal sensitivity to State and local concerns in the area are absolutely essential . . . If the legitimate Federal role is to be most effective, then the Federal executive branch and State and local governments must have the maximum opportunity to understand one another.

The Council will provide such a forum for representatives of State and local government to discuss and impact on Federal education programs and policies.

The Council will advise the Secretary and the President on intergovernmental problems, progress, and concerns regarding education and intergovernmental relations. It will serve as a strong influence at the Federal level which recognizes the primary responsibility for education resides with State, local, and tribal governments, public, nonpublic, and private institutions. OMB Director James McIntyre's testimony before the committee in support of an Intergovernmental Advisory Council suggested it would improve the intergovernmental system for developing and carrying out education policies.

Appointed to the Council by the President would be 22 nonpartisan representatives from State and local government, State and local educational agencies, and private citizens, including citizens, students, and nonpublic institution representatives.

The committee recognizes that Federal education policy has expanded dramatically without an assessment of the resulting changes and impact at the State and local levels. The creation of an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education provides opportunities to solve existing problems in education. The Council should be a vehicle for improving intergovernmental relations by highlighting intergovernmental issues. It will provide a forum for all parties having intergovernmental interests to assess the Federal Government's impact upon education policy. It will be in a position to encourage improved management of education at all levels and insure that the Department will be responsive to a wide range of interests.

The Department itself will be served by the Council. The effectiveness of most Federal programs repends upon the delivery of the service of those programs at the State or local level where the Federal Government has limited authority. The widely-scattered education programs have caused confusion for State, local, and private agencies with respect to fragmentation and duplication at the Federal level. Testimony before the committee by Lubbie Harper, Jr., executive assistant for the New Haven Public Schools, commented on the disparity between State and Federal guidelines. State agencies must deal with a myriad of agencies at the Federal level which often result in excessive amounts of paperwork requirements. The Council will provide a mechanism for involving the public to facilitate intergovernmental coordination. It will assess Federal policies and make recommendations to insure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

The Council is not intended to be a buffer between the Secretary of Education and the President or Congress, nor is it expected to be involved in the day-to-day operations of the Department or in the annual budget process. Its purpose is to work toward the attainment of Federal, State, and local educational objectives. Its focus should be upon the long-term health of the intergovernmental system for managing education.

FEDERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

There is a strong need for effective coordination of education programs in the Federal Government. The committee believes a useful tool for the Secretary of Education in achieving this coordination will be the Federal Interagency Committee on Education (FICE).

FICE was first created by an Executive order issued by President Johnson in October 1964, and later revised and updated in another issued by President Nixon in January 1974. In both cases, the FICE was created because:

> Continued close coordination of Federal educational activities will facilitate the resolution of common problems and otherwise promote effective planning and management of (education) activities.

Through the creation of the Department of Education, the Congress will be taking a giant step toward consolidating a widely scattered, badly fragmented Federal education effort. Although the Department will, as provided for in S. 991, consolidate more than 170 education programs, there will still be other education programs in various Federal agencies. Coordination of these programs with those of the Department of Education will be an important function of the Secretary.

One such example would be in the area of international education. Increasing global interdependence hastened by exchanges of ideas, people, technology, natural resources, and culture make international education an increasing part of the learning experience of all Americans. The establishment of FICE will provide an excellent vehicle for the Secretary of Education, who has primary responsibility for internal activities, to work with the Director of the International Communication Agency (ICA) who has primary responsibility for coordinating external activities in education and cultural affairs to propose and coordinate strategies for improving programs in international education.

For higher education, the importance of a strong FICE increases. As Charles Saunders of the American Council on Education told the committee:

> The higher education community has had more interest in other programs elsewhere in the government than in the (HEW) Education Division. But at the same time, the need to coordinate the relationship across the government still remains very acute.

At the present the existing nonstatutory FICE does not function at the Secretary level. The chairperson of FICE is the Assistant Secretary for Education. Agency representatives to the committee are often not high-ranking officials, which detracts from its effectiveness.

S. 991 elevates and upgrades FICE and gives it new prominence. The legislation mandates the chairperson shall be the Secretary of Education, thereby giving the committee Cabinet-level leadership. The bill names some of the key Federal agencies which must designate representatives to FICE. In addition, the Secretary can appoint other members to serve on FICE or to participate in its meetings. Other participants or members might include ACTION, ICA, and the Smithsonian Institution. The language stipulates that these individuals must be from high-ranking, policy-level positions. The committee believes this is crucial, as these members will be in a position to better implement FICE's recommendations in their specific agencies.

The legislation provides statutorily for FICE. The committee, which is charged with studying the Federal Government operation and structure with an eye towards efficiency, believes coordination will be one of the single most important tasks of the Secretary of Education. A job this important should not be left to Executive order authority, when priorities and needs change with the coming and going of different administrations. With S. 991, coordination of Federal education programs becomes a congressionally mandated priority and function.

The conduct of various studies, surveys, and evaluations relating to the overall impact and influence of Federal educational activities are also important initiatives for the Secretary to direct. The committee believes the Secretary should make great use of the FICE in conducting such studies to facilitate interagency cooperation.

RESEARCH AND IMPROVEMENT IN EDUCATION

The committee has paid particular attention to the need to provide the new Department with a strong base for its research and improvement activities. The bill establishes an Office of Educational Research and Improvement (ERI), headed by an Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement.

The Department's assistance in the development of new knowledge about the educational process, and encouragement of its use in improving education, will be a major activity of the Department of Education. Both the Administration and organizations representing educational researchers have endorsed the importance of providing for a strong research component within the new Department, James T. McIntyre, Jr., Director of the Office of Management and Budget, told the committee:

> The research and improvement functions must receive a high place in the Department, given the important role of the Federal Government in supporting such functions. We expect that by giving these functions more prominence in the new Department, the research efforts funded by the Federal Government, and the ability to disseminate information on different approaches to learning and development will be enhanced.[11]

The American Educational Research Association, in prepared testimony for the Committee, stressed that "it is necessary for education research, evaluation, development dissemination, and analysis to be structured into a position of influence within the department."

Testimony given the committee by former Commissioner of Education S. M. Brownell aptly stated the importance of such a component:

[11] McIntyre testimony before Senate Governmental Affairs Committee on S. 991, May 1, 1978.

> In summary, I have a strong conviction that there is need for a separate education research component within the Education Department which should be able to assist and be assisted by many of the service units in the Department. But it also should have the status and resources to promote basic research in education in universities. Probably a large measure of its resources should be channeled to applied research in educational research institutes, centers or experiment stations which could be held accountable for the continuity and quality of the field testing. It would be my judgment that it would require an individual with the rank of Assistant Secretary for Educational Research to head this important function in the Department.[13]

In total, more than $700 million is spent on statistical analysis, research, development, demonstration, dissemination, and evaluation efforts in the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the National Science Foundation Science Education Directorate, and other programs that would be transferred to the new Department by S. 991.

Support for research and improvement activities are the mechanisms through which the Federal Government can least intrusively and most productively increase the capacities of State and local and private educational agencies, other levels of governments, private organizations, and individuals to improve the quality of American education.

Federal research and improvement activities: An overview

Given the importance of the Federal government's support for research in education, the committee's attention focused on numerous Federal agencies conducting educational research. The National Institute of Education (NIE) has the mandate to both conduct and coordinate educational research at all levels. The National Science Foundation, particularly through its science education programs, directs large amounts of money toward educational research, development, and improvement of science education. The Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education (FIPSE) supports innovative projects in the area of post-secondary education, and the National Center for Educational Statistics (NCES) collects data, and conducts a wide range of research surveys on all aspects of education. The Office of Education administers the majority of research-related program activities in the Education Division, for example, operating programs in vocational education, education of the handicapped, and titles I, III, IV, VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, support applied research and demonstrations designed to improve educational practice.

The committee is convinced that a much more rational organizational structure should be designed for the plethora of Federal efforts to support analysis, investigation, and improvement of our educational system. Moreover, the research and improvement activities of the Federal Government need to be more effective and efficiently managed.

An Office of Educational Research and Improvement

S. 991 establishes an Office for Educational Research and Improvement, in order to correct problems with, and build on the strengths of, current research and improvement activities at the Federal level. The Office will be headed by an Assistant Secretary (executive level IV).

In establishing an Office of ERI, the committee is both certifying the role and elevating the priority of Federal R. & D. activities which are designed to improve education, public understanding, and the capacities of educational institutions at all levels.

The new Office will serve as an integrating and coordinating mechanism for supporting the effectiveness of a wide range of research, development, demonstration, dissemination, evaluation, analytical, and other activities facilitating change.

The committee considered several alternative ways of reorganizing these functions.

To many, the National Institute of Education appeared to be a logical base from which the Federal Government might build a more rational and comprehensive research and improvement function. The committee considered effects of expanding the National Institute of Education so as to incorporate many of the research, development, demonstration, and dissemination functions now performed by such diverse agencies as FIPSE, the science education programs of the Science Education Directorate of NSF, and many education program offices of the current Office of Education. Another proposal considered was to lapse the National Institute of Education but transfer its functions and those of other programs, to a new Institute for Educational Research and Improvement. A third approach considered in committee discussions was to reorganize the functions of the various agencies and programs transferred into several functional and distinct units within a new Institute for Educational Research and Improvement—a concept of "institutes" within a larger national institute.

However, rather than reorganize specific units at this time, the committee decided to transfer several programs intact to a new Office for Educational Research and Improvement in the Department. Section 212 establishes this Office which shall be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement, who shall be compensated at level IV of the executive salary schedule. The functions of the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education, Federal grants for nonbroadcast telecommunications demonstration, and programs transferred from the Director of the National Science Foundation are specifically delegated to the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement. Although the committee did not explicitly transfer the National Institute of Education or its functions to this Office, it assumes that most or all of the functions currently in the NIE do belong with other related research and improvement activities in the new Office. The Secretary may delegate such additional research and improvement duties and powers to the Assistant Secretary as are deemed appropriate.

As noted, this committee expects the Human Resources Committee to direct its attention to the reorganization of educational research and improvement functions when hearings to extend FIPSE, NIE, science education, and telecommunications program authorizations are held next year. At that time the possible relationships between the programs transferred by this legislation to the Office for Educational Research and Improvement and the overall mission of the Office for Educational Research and Improvement can be considered further.

The committee has also been made aware of the special concerns of many higher education and academic groups in wanting to preserve the integrity and quality of programs supported by the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education and by the Science Education Directorate. Clearly these programs are different from, though complementary to, those innovation-type programs funded by USOE and NIE. The needs of these programs, which are aimed mostly at improving undergraduate education, should be taken into account, and we expect the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary to work with appropriate authorizing committees and subcommittees to subsequently give these and other research and improvement programs more explicit guidance with respect to structure and function.

Criteria for assigning research and improvement functions

The bill provides authority for the Secretary to assign and reassign existing programs among units of the new Department including the research and improvement unit. The committee does not, however, intend that all demonstration, development, and dissemination activities be assigned to the Office for Educational Research and Improvement. Operating program units should retain some capacity for data collection, evaluation, and dissemination of exemplary programs. Indeed, their present capabilities to carry out these functions should be strengthened.

The central distinguishing characteristic of the functions that would be performed by the Office of Research and Improvement is that—while they complement and contribute to the effectiveness of major service-support and formula-driven Federal programs—they are not directed by the informational needs of these activities and policies.

Peer review and competitive processes should guide the allocations of most research funds.

A sufficient number of career and short-term professionals involved in research and improvement activities should be recruited by the excepted service authorities in order to facilitate flexibility and attract the best qualified persons.

Greater emphasis should be placed on developing ways to improve the dissemination of the results of research and improvement activities.

The organizational structure of the Office of Educational Research and Improvement

As noted earlier, and as the assumptions just identified imply, the Office of Educational Research and Improvement will not encompass all activites relating to research, development, dissemination, demonstrations, evaluation, and policy analysis. It will, however, encompass a substantial proportion of these activities, particularly those that support the priorities of State, local, and private educational agencies and other organizations and individuals concerned with learning more about and improving the quality of American education.

Among the existing organizational units or functions that are specifically assigned or that might be included within the Office are:

All elements of the science education programs transferred to the Department from the National Science Foundation (Assigned.)

The National Institute of Education.

The Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education. (Assigned.)

The nonbroadcast telecommunications programs transferred by this bill from the Office of the Secretary of HEW to the Department. (Assigned.)

Those activities of NCES that involve longitudinal research or analysis on the condition and future of American education.

A capacity for policy-related research and evaluation studies assigned to the Office by the Congress or the Secretary.

Some existing demonstration and development programs aimed at supporting specific changes in cirriculum or science-related programs, for example, metric or environmental education.

Programs aimed at enhancing the capacity of educational institutions to change in directions they define, for example, title IV–C of ESEA, which supports innovation activities of State education agencies.

Telecommunications development activities currently scattered among numerous offices can be brought together in an effort to develop a more coherent Federal policy in this area.

Educational policy analysis studies and associated staff activities, which are also scattered among various offices and levels of the educational bureaucracy, can be brought together for the purpose of associating these tasks with the decisionmaking and planning processes.

The possibilities of improving the linkages and integration of numerous related, and sometimes overlapping program authorities are endless. The committee expects the Secretary and Assistant Secretary to develop a more cohesive framework for the myriad number of research and improvement programs.

Locating the science education programs now in NSF alongside those science-related programs currently in the Office provides an example of the potential opportunities the Office for ERI provides. The demonstration and faculty development programs in science education are consistent with and supportive of many of FIPSE's purposes. Science-related education programs currently administered by the Education Division equal in size those being transferred from the Science Education Directorate of the NSF. Improving linkages among this array of scientific programs will enrich the quality of Federal efforts to deal with the serious decline in student achievement in science and related fields.

Advisory and policy councils

Two programs transferred by the committee to the Office for Educational Research and Improvement currently have their own advisory councils: FIPSE and the science education programs transferred from NSF. The committee considered several alternatives for the reorganization of these advisory councils and the policy council, National Council for Educational Research (NCER), of the National Institute of Education.

One model considered was to have a policy council modeled after NCER for the entire Office of Educational Research and Improvement.

A second model recommended an advisory council for the entire Office of Educational Research and Improvement.[13] In both these cases, the committee considered the possibility of having subcouncils for the various programs within the Office, similar to those created under the authority of the National Science Board.

Although the committee ultimately decided it wise not to merge or change any of the existing councils, or create a new overall council for the Office, it expects the Secretary, in consultation with the Senate Human Resources Committee and the House Education and Labor Committee, to consider various alternative forms in which the functions performed by the current councils might be reorganized and strengthened.[14] The committee is convinced of the importance of "buffering" the basic and applied research functions of the Office, and suggests that this issue be considered within the context of the creation of the new Office and the Assistant Secretary position.

Concluding comments

The committee expects the Assistant Secretary for the ERI to support the policies and priorities specified in Sections 404 and 405 of the General Education Provisions Act, which relate to the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education and the National Institute of Education. Equal commitments are required for continuing R. & D. policies and activities relating to the science education programs being transferred by the bill from NSF.

The committee recognizes the need to give the Secretary of Education considerable discretion in organizing research and improvement programs in the Department, and in delegating specific programs and activities to the Office for Educational Research and Improvement. At the same time, the committee expects the Secretary to consider the committee's view of the role and activities of the Office for Research and Improvement. Moreover, in developing the character, structure and practices of the Office and in allocating research and improvement functions throughout the Department, the committee suggests the Secretary work closely with the Senate Human Resources Committee and the House Education and Labor Committee.

HEW—SPECIAL INSTITUTIONS

There are presently four educationally oriented institutions over which the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare maintains budgetary oversight, and for which the Federal Government is the major source of revenue. Each of these "special institutions" have as their primary mission the education and assistance of special, handicapped, or disadvantaged constituencies.

The committee believes the transfer of the current relationship between these Special Institutions and the Federal Government to the [13] The draft bill considered by the committee in markup folded the functions of NIE into an Institute for Educational Research and Improvement, along with the FIPSE, science education, and telecommunications-demonstration functions. It also changed NCER's policy role to an advisory one. An amendment agreed to in committee by voice vote preserved the NIE intact, as well as the NCER and changed the proposed Institute for Educational Research and Improvement to an Office of Educational Research and Improvement. The NCER, then, would remain as a policymaking council, but only for NIE—authorized activities. This was done in order to allow the authorizing committees an opportunity to consider this question of additional reorganization further in the context of renewed authorizing legislation.

[14] Ibid.

Department of Education is a logical and wise move. The four institutions include:

American Printing House for the Blind, located in Louisville, Ky., was established by Congress to provide educational materials to elementary and secondary school-age blind students.

National Technical Institute for the Deaf, located in Rochester, N.Y., provides residential, coeducational post secondary technical education for the deaf.

Gallaudet College, in Washington, an educational institution providing college preparatory, undergraduate and continuing education programs for the deaf. Gallaudet also includes the Model Secondary School for the Deaf and the Kendall Demonstration Elementary School.

Howard University, in Washington, a private nonprofit undergraduate college, graduate school and medical facility emphasizing the training of minorities in technical and professional fields.

The committee is impressed with the successes of these institutions, and recommends their association with the Federal Government continue. The missions of these four institutions will follow closely that of the Department of Education.

In the past, all four institutions agree HEW has allowed them maximum flexibility in determining their programs and content of curricula, and in experimenting with new, innovative ideas in their special educational missions. The committee strongly believes such a high degree of independence and autonomy must continue in the Department of Education.

While the responsibility for oversight of these institutions is statutorily vested in the Office of the Secretary, the committee suggests the Secretary should consider the possibility of coordinating the functions of Gallaudet College, National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and American Printing House for the Blind with those of the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services in the new Department. Oversight for Howard University should be coordinated with and linked to the Office of Postsecondary Education.

USDA GRADUATE SCHOOL

The committee recommends the transfer of the USDA Graduate School to the new Department.

The Graduate School was created in 1921 and it has evolved over the years into a first-rate continuing education program benefiting nearly 30,000 employees of the Department of Agriculture, employees of other Federal agencies, and other citizens living in the Washington metropolitan area. The school receives no Federal appropriations, and its staff is not subject to civil service guidelines. The school does not exist for any purpose integrally related to the mission of the USDA. In fact, most of its students are employees of other Federal agencies, or are members of the general public. The committee believes the central purpose and goal of the Graduate School relates closely to that of the Department of Education. The new Department will be very much concerned with adult and continuing education, which is the primary rationale for the Graduate School. Further, the school will develop a more professional image by its association with an education agency, rather than an agricultural agency. The school's ties to USDA have been the source of much confusion over what it really does and what it accomplishes.

The committee expects the Secretaries of Education and Agriculture to develop a plan and set of procedures, with concurrence of the Director and Board of Trustees of the school, for transferring the administrative offices to the Department of Education. Appropriate facilities should be made available which assure that the Graduate School continues and flourishes as a nonaccrediting and continuing educational institution.

The Graduate School should remain independent and not subject to any statutory or administrative responsibilities established by this act. In no such manner should the Secretary of Education, or any other official of the Federal Government, attempt to exercise any direct influence over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of the Graduate School. That should remain the primary responsibility of the school's board of trustees.

The Committee assumes that the Department and its education programs will require substantial library, classroom, demonstration and audiovisual facilities, and that these facilities can be shared and utilized by the participants, faculty and students of the Graduate School.

The committee intends that the transfer of the Graduate School will not terminate or lessen educational services provided by the Graduate School to the Department of Agriculture and its employees. Nor should the change in administrative locations alter the special relationships which the Graduate School currently maintains with other Federal agencies, offices and private institutions throughout the Washington area.

Moreover, the Graduate School should continue to be maintained as an independent, nongovernmental institution and, other than indirect services accorded to its administrators and program operations, no federally appropriate funds should be used to support the ongoing operation of the Graduate School functions.

The Graduate School should also retain the prerogative to operate in its present format and under existing policies, or to sever its current physical ties with federal agencies and, thus, become a more independent, self-sufficient and autonomous educational institution. Such alterations of policies influencing or governing future directions of the Graduate School should be totally within the jurisdiction of its director, deputy director and board of trustees. This transfer should not, in any way, affect the school's by-laws or rules and regulations.

The committee believes the transfer of the Graduate School to the Department of Education will have a beneficial impact on both institutions. The committee fully expects the Graduate School will continue to expand and prosper under the new Department.

COMMITTEE ACTION

The Governmental Affairs Committee held 10 days of hearings on S. 991 during which 100 witnesses testified. The committee also held three markup sessions on July 11, 14, and 18, 1978. The bill was reported favorably by the twelve members present on July 18, with an additional three Senators voting in favor by proxy.

HEAD START

On July 11, the committee unanimously decided to delete the proposed transfer of the Head Start program from HEW to the Department of Education. On July 14 an amendment introduced on June 15 by Senator Heinz and cosponsored by Senators Javits, Percy, and Glenn pertaining to the deletion of the Head Start program was adopted in its entirety by voice vote in order to clarify the committee action on July 11. Senator Danforth was added as a cosponsor to the amendment at this time. This amendment deleted the establishment of the Office of Child Development, which would have administered the Head Start program. Its language also provided assurances that there is no other provision in the Act, relating to authority for other transfers from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, that would provide for the transfer of Head Start.

In the committee's discussion of this amendment, it was felt that it would be inappropriate to include the Head Start program in the Department of Education. The committee recognized that Head Start provides comprehensive services including health, nutrition, education, dental, mental health, parental involvement and social services. The outstanding success of this program can be partially attributed to Head Start's unique characteristics—significant parental involvement, comprehensive services and a diverse Federal-to-local delivery system. Because it has been successful in all these program components in its present organizational location and because these services are comprehensive in nature, it was felt that its present organizational location within the Office of Human Development Services of HEW was an appropriate location for the program. The committee recommends that Head Start, thus, be maintained in its present location within the Administration for Children, Youth and Families (ACYF) and not be placed in any organizational structure where the program would be administered by State education- or welfare-oriented agencies. The unique characteristics mentioned above should be maintained and strengthened. The committee recommends that those officials in the program work closely with the Department of Education officials so that the successful Head Start model can be a guide for many of the programs in the new Department.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

On July 11, the committee considered an amendment proposed by Senator Humphrey to transfer vocational rehabilitation programs from HEW to the Department of Education and to create an Office and Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. It was passed by voice vote without objection. On July 14, the committee also approved by voice vote a clarifying amendment introduced by Senator Chiles to insure that placement of vocational rehabilitation services in a Federal education agency would not mandate similar placement at the State level.

The Humphrey amendment transfers to the Secretary the functions being administered by the Commissioner of Rehabilitation Services Administration under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

In addition, Senator Ribicoff introduced amendments requested by Senator Randolph to clarify the intent of the Humphrey amendment. The purpose was to ensure that the Randolph-Sheppard vending facility program and the Office of Handicapped Individuals were transferred to the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. It was clarified that it was not the intention of the Humphrey amendment to transfer Vocational Rehabilitation Services for Supplemental Security Income beneficiaries or Vocational Rehabilitation Services for Social Security Disability Beneficiaries. The committee adopted these amendments by voice vote on July 27.

INDIAN EDUCATION

Senator Stevens introduced an amendment to delete the proposed transfer of Indian education programs from the BIA to the Department of Education. The committee voted to defeat the amendment by a rollcall vote of 3 yeas—7 nays.

Child Nutrition Programs

On July 14, Senator Percy offered an amendment to delete the proposed transfer of the child nutrition programs form USDA to the Department of Education. The amendment was defeated by a rollcall vote of 8 yeas–8 nays. [Senator Danforth requested by unanimous consent that his vote be recorded in the official record as in favor of the Percy amendment.] During the discussion of this transfer, Senator Ribicoff introduced a compromise amendment on behalf of the administration which retains the responsibility for commodity funding in the Department of Agriculture. The compromise amendment was approved by voice vote.

Intergovernmental relations

On July 18, the committee adopted a series of amendments proposed by Senators Roth and Danforth to strengthen provisions ensuring the rights of State and local governments concerning their direction over schools. The Roth-Danforth amendments also change the membership of the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education by providing that the President shall consult with such organizations as the National Governors Conference, National Association of Counties, the League of Cities, and the U.S. Conference of Mayors in the selection of members. The intent of the Roth-Danforth amendments is to ensure that the new Department will not try to preempt the local decision-making process and assume new powers that might infringe upon the powers of the local school boards. The committee stressed the importance of the consultation with and recommendations of the various groups involved in educational matters.

Human Resources Committee amendments

During the committee's consideration of the bill, in markup, it was agreed that the Human Resources Committee would have an additional 2-weeks to submit any amendments to the Governmental Affairs Committee. These amendments would be submitted to the Committee by Senator Javits, ranking minority member of the Human Resources Committee and also a member of the Governmental Affairs Committee. On July 27, three additional amendments were introduced by Senator

Javits on behalf of the Human Resources Committee. The first amendment deletes section 403 of the bill which authorizes the Secretary to establish, combine, or terminate advisory committees.

Section 403 provided authorization for the Secretary to establish, combine, or terminate such advisory committees as he or she deemed appropriate to carry out the functions of the Secretary or the Department. The deletion of this section would provide that provisions of the Federal Advisory Committee Act and section 448 of the General Education Provisions Act be maintained, where applicable.

Senator Percy expressed concern that some consideration be given to the proliferation of advisory committees. Senator Javits agreed to discuss this concern with Senators Pell and Williams for possible floor consideration of amendment with respect to advisory committees.

The second amendment was concerned with Section 413 which provides authority for the Secretary to allocate or reallocate functions among officers of the Department and to establish, consolidate, alter or discontinue organization entities within the Department. Section 413 was revised to specifically prohibit the reallocation of any office, bureau, unit or other entity within the Department established by statute or any function vested by statute in such an entity or officer of such an entity unless it is in respect to specific entities specified in section 413. If the Secretary wishes to reallocate functions or consolidate, alter or discontinue such entities, the Secretary must notify the Senate Human Resources and the House Education and Labor Committees not less than 90 days before the proposed action. The notification must include a complete statement of the action proposed to be taken.

This amendment insures that the reorganization authority provided the President with respect to reorganization of Departments is preserved as well as statutory obligations established by Congress; however, the section provides the Secretary specific limited flexibility with respect to certain offices previously within the Education Division of HEW and now transferred to Department of Education.

The third amendment further defines the planning and evaluation functions of the Department by including the development of policies to promote the efficient and coordinated administration of the Department and its programs. The amendment requires that the officer performing these functions be one of the level IV assistant secretary positions established by the bill. In addition, Section 427 would require the Secretary to also discuss in the Annual Report anticipated future progress of the Department towards the attainment of the stated findings and purposes in the bill. In the preparation of the report, the Secretary would consult with the public and hold hearings on the report after its submission to Congress.

The committee approved these amendments by voice vote.

FINAL ACTION

Senators Percy, Roth, Glenn, and Mathias were added as cosponsors of the legislation. The committee voted unanimously to report the bill favorably on July 18, agreeing to reconvene for reconsideration after the Human Resources Committee submitted its amendments. On July 27, the committee adopted by voice vote the amendments offered by Senator Javits on behalf of the Human Resources Committee.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF S. 991

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 101. Statement of Findings

Section 101 sets forth the findings of the Congress that (1) education is fundamental to the growth and achievement of the Nation; (2) there is a continual need to provide equal access by all Americans, especially the disadvantaged and handicapped, to high quality educational opportunities; (3) the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with State, local and tribal governmental, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities and families; (4) the dispersion of education programs across a large number of Federal agencies has led to fragmented, duplicative and often inconsistent Federal policies relating to education; (5) there is ineffective management of existing Federal resources for State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions; (6) there is substantial evidence that the quality of education and the development of basic skills are not keeping pace with current demands; (7) the current structure of the executive branch of the Government fails to recognize the importance of education and does not allow for sufficient Presidential and public consideration of issues relating to education; and (8) the importance of education is increasing as new technologies and alternative approaches to traditional education are considered, as society becomes more complex, and as equal opportunities in education and employment are promoted; and it is in the public interest and will promote the general welfare of the United States to establish a Department of Education.

Section 102. Purposes

Section 102 states the purposes of the Department in order to (1) insure that education receives the appropriate emphasis at the Federal level; (2) enable the Federal Government to more effectively coordinate education activities and programs; (3) continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities; (4) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public and private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents and students to improve the quality of education, while acknowledging the right of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions to formulate policies, choose curricula, decide administrative questions, and choose program content with respect to their educational programs; (5) encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the decisionmaking process relating to education; (6) promote the quality and relevance of education to individual needs; (7) broaden approaches to meeting educational and developmental needs by strengthening relationships among schools, parents, students, communities, the workplace, and other related institutions; (8) (A) provide leadership in the support of research relating to human development and learning systems that complement education, with a greater emphasis on the practical application of such research; (B) collect and analyze information on the progress and condition of education in the United States; and (C) work with State, local, and tribal officials, public and nonpublic educational institutions, community organizations, parents and students to implement the findings of such research at the local level; (9) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, tribal, and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated educational needs of such agencies, especially with respect to the simplification of the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, as well as the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens and constraints, including unnecessary paperwork on the recipients of Federal funds; and (10) assess the potential contribution of educational institutions, toward the improvement of education by creating mechanisms for them to bring problems to the attention of appropriate departments and agencies and make recommendations to foster their continuing vitality.

Subsection (b) states it is the intention of the Congress in creating the Department to protect the rights of State, local and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, and selection of curricula and program content, and to strengthen and improve the direction of such governments and institutions over their educational programs and policies.

Section 103. Definitions

This section defines terms used in the Act. Such terms include Department; Secretary; Under Secretary; Assistant Secretary; Director (Director of the Office for Civil Rights); Administrator (Administrator of the Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children); Council (Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education); Committee (Federal Interagency Committee on Education); and function.

TITLE II—ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

Section 201. Department of Education

Section 201 establishes as an executive department of the Government, the Department of Education.

Section 202. Principal Officers

Section 202 provides for the establishment of the Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level I of the executive schedule contained in section 5312 of title 5, United States Code. Also established is the position of an Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Under Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level III of the executive schedule.

The section states the Secretary shall designate the order in which other officials of the Department shall act for and perform the functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of the Secretary and/or Under Secretary.

The section establishes 14 other principal officers of the Department: an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services; for Indian Education; for Child Nutrition; for Elementary and Secondary Education; for Postsecondary Education; for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education; for Educational Research and Improvement; a Director of the Office for Civil Rights; two additional Assistant Secretaries; an Inspector General; and a General Counsel. Each of the Assistant Secretaries, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the Inspector General, and the General Counsel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each of these officers shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe, and shall report directly to the Secretary. Each shall be compensated at the rate provided for level IV of the executive schedule.

The section provides that the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among lists of candidates submitted by tribes or other organizations of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. It is the committee's belief that Indian tribes, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts must be involved in the selection of this officer. The committee believes the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education should be of American Indian, Alaskan Native, or Aleut origin. The President should make a comprehensive effort to find a qualified individual, who is well versed in the special and unique needs of Indian students, and who has a demonstrated record of experience in improving the education of Indian people.

The section also states that one of the Assistant Secretaries shall administer the intergovernmental functions of the Department under section 203(11) and shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe. It was felt that the assignment of Federal-State-local relations functions should be performed by a senior departmental official at executive level IV. This individual would be a high-level position to insure a State perspective on a continuing basis in all departmental affairs.

Also, one of the Assistant Secretaries shall administer the functions under section 203(13) for planning, evaluation, and policies of the Department. This will insure a high-level officer is specifically responsible for the efficient and coordinated administration of the Department and its programs and will encourage improvement in education.

The section also provides for an Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependent Children. The Administrator shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. The Administrator shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the executive schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

One additional officer is provided for who shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. This officer shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the executive schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

The section states that whenever the President submits the name of an individual to the Senate for confirmation as an officer of the Department under subsections (c), (d), and (f), the President shall state the particular functions of the Department such individual will exercise upon taking office. This provision is not meant to prohibit the Secretary from reassigning duties and functions or from changing such duties or functions of the officer at a later time if it is necessary to do so for the efficient operation or functioning of the Department.

Section 203 outlines the functions of the Department. It states the function of the Department shall be to promote the cause and advancement of education throughout the United States and shall include—(1) administration of programs pertaining to elementary and secondary education including the administration of the follow-through program; (2) administration of programs pertaining to postsecondary education; (3) administration of programs pertaining to occupational, adult, and community education; (4) administration of education grants and other programs for which the Department has responsibility under law; (5) administration of child nutrition programs; (6) administration of programs relating to special education and rehabilitative services; (7) administration of programs for education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts, and fulfillment of the obligations of the Government relating to education of such individuals; (8) administration of schools for the overseas dependent children of personnel of the Department of Defense; (9) enforcement of the civil rights laws relating to education; (10) research, dissemination of improved educational practices, and the coordinated collection and dissemination of statistics; (11) intergovernmental policies and relations, including responsibility for assuring that Federal education policies and procedures supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, and parents to improve their educational programs; (12) public information; (13) planning for and evaluation of the programs of the Department, and development of policies to promote the efficient and coordinated administration of the Department and its programs and to encourage improvement in education; (14) congressional relations, including responsibility for providing a continuing liaison between the Department and the Congress; (15) administration and management of the Department, including responsibility for legal assistance, accounting, personnel, payroll, budgeting, and other administrative functions; and (16) monitoring parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required by law, and encouraging the involvement of parents, students, and public in the development and implementation of departmental programs.

Section 204. Office for Civil Rights

Section 204 establishes an Office for Civil Rights to be administered by a Director. In light of the high importance the committee attributes to civil rights enforcement in education, the bill provided in section 202 that the Director shall be an executive level IV, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, who reports directly to the Secretary. The committee recommends that the Director be accorded the title Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights to reflect the visibility and stature his or her activities should have within the Department. The Secretary shall delegate to the Director all functions of the Office for Civil Rights of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to education transferred to the Secretary (other than administrative and support functions). The Director shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

The Office for Civil Rights (OCR) shall be the agency within the Department with the authority to exercise sanctions if any agency in the Department funds recipients who violate non-discrimination provisions. The committee intends that this Office have the resources and authority necessary to do its job.

This responsibility, however, does not diminish the Secretary's responsibility as the chief policy official of the Department, who must be responsible for civil rights compliance and enforcement.

Section 204 provides that the Secretary shall delegate all civil rights compliance and enforcement functions (other than administrative and support functions) to the Office for Civil Rights. This provision was included to make certain that civil rights enforcement responsibilities are not delegated by the Secretary to any official in the Department other than the OCR Director. Civil rights responsibilities are law enforcement responsibilities, and program units within the Department cannot be expected to impose legal sanctions on themselves. This is not to be construed as barring; and in fact, the committee intends to encourage every agency within the Department to consider civil rights criteria in the awarding and monitoring of grants, contracts or other Federal funds. A strong, adequately staffed Office for Civil Rights, with complete authority from the Secretary, can insure that all civil rights laws are enforced in all program units of the new Department.

This prohibition against the Secretary delegating authority to enforce civil rights laws to offices other than the OCR is not intended to limit the Secretary's ability to utilize staff who work in other offices both inside or outside the Department for other functions such as preaward audits or postgrant monitoring. Clearly, such staff might provide specific expertise necessary to help carry out or lend support to civil rights enforcement activities. However, under section 204(a), such staff must be responsible solely to the OCR Director if they are to assume any of the Secretary's responsibilities for employing sanctions for noncompliance.

Section 204(b) requires the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights each year to prepare and transmit a report to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress concerning the status of compliance with civil rights laws relating to education. In addition to this status report, the report shall include a statement concerning the OCR's plans and recommendations to insure improved enforcement of and continued compliance with civil rights laws related to education. The committee anticipates that this report will identify significant problems of compliance or enforcement which may require oversight by appropriate congressional committees and a description of the specific enforcement activities indicated by OCR during the previous year.

The annual report shall be submitted directly and independently by the Director to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress without clearance or approval by any executive branch official. The committee views this report as a mechanism to obtain a precise, objective statement of the status of and future plans for civil rights enforcement in education. The Congress must have an independent annual report on civil rights activities that is free from potential programmatic and practical pressures that may be brought to bear on a Secretary in order to determine if the laws of the Nation are being implemented. A direct, unedited report from the Director will provide this independent view. The Director should, however, insofar as feasible, provide a copy of the report sufficiently in advance of its submission to the Congress to provide a reasonable opportunity for comments of the Secretary to be appended to it when transmitted to Congress by the Director.

Section 205. Office of Elementary and Secondary Education

Section 205 establishes in the Department an Office of Elementary and Secondary Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education. In addition, the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education shall perform such other duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 206. Office of Postsecondary Education

Section 206 establishes in the Department an Office of Postsecondary Education. The Office shall be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education. The Office would assure that the needs and concerns of postsecondary institutions are represented. The Office will develop and coordinate policies and programs designed to improve postsecondary educational opportunities. Policies and procedures that recognize changing characteristics in postsecondary education should be initiated. The Assistant Secretary should advise the Secretary and Congress of these trends and also direct, coordinate, and implement departmental policies with respect to postsecondary student assistance, institutions and community colleges, and provide institutional support.

The Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 207. Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education

Section 207 establishes an Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education, to be administered by an Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education. This Office will be responsible for administering those programs relating to manpower training and development, technical training, and other functions concerned with vocational, occupational, adult, and continuing education. Because of the creation of this new office, the committee expects the functions and duties previously performed by the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education to be performed by the new Office.

The Assistant Secretary shall also perform such additional duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 208. Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services

This section establishes within the Department an Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary of Education for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services.

This Office will contain the programs administered by the Rehabilitation Services Administration (RSA), with the exception of vocational rehabilitation services for social security disability beneficiaries and vocational rehabilitation services for supplemental security income beneficiaries, or the developmental disability programs. In addition, the Office will administer the programs previously administered by the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped (BEH); and the Office for Handicapped Individuals (OHI). All of these entities are presently located in HEW and their functions are transferred to the Department.

It is the intention of the committee to create a comprehensive office of consolidated programs for the education of the handicapped. The committee believes this will initiate the development of an effective policy for the education of the handicapped that will aid handicapped individuals from birth through adulthood. The goal of this Office should be to increase the ability of handicapped individuals to adapt to society.

The committee intends, through the creation of this Office and Assistant Secretary, to make special education and rehabilitative services a high priority in the Department of Education. The Assistant Secretary should make strong efforts to coordinate his or her activities with those of the Department. Also, the creation of this Office will provide the Assistant Secretary an opportunity to efficiently coordinate the programs which were administered by RSA with those which were administered by BEH.

It is the committee's expectation that the Assistant Secretary will be a strong advocate for the furtherance of the goal of increasing the ability of handicapped individuals to adapt to society.

Athough the committee strongly believes vocational rehabilitation programs are educationally focused and should be included within the Department of Education at the Federal level, it is not the intention of section 208 to change any existing organizational structural requirements for vocational rehabilitation program at the State level; thus the enactment of this section does not specifically mandate any particular organizational structure of the programs at the State level with respect to the transfer.

Section 209. Office of Child Nutrition

This section establishes an Office of Child Nutrition, to be headed by an Assistant Secretary for Child Nutrition. The Office will administer all functions transferred to the Secretary from the Department of Agriculture relating to the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act.

The committee intends, through the creation of this Office and Assistant Secretary, to make child nutrition a high priority in the Department of Education. The Assistant Secretary should make strong efforts to coordinate his or her activities with those of the Department. The committee believes the Assistant Secretary should be a strong advocate for better nutrition in the Federal Government, and in the nation's schools.

The committee intends that all functions transferred under section 302 be delegated to the Assistant Secretary for Child Nutrition, except for the oversight of the graduate school and administrative and support functions.

Section 210. Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children

This section establishes an Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children, to be administered by the Administrator for Education for Overseas Dependent Children.

The Administrator would carry out the functions transferred to the Secretary from the Departmen of Defense relating to the Office of Dependents Schools of the Department of Defense and to the operation of schools for dependent children of members of the Armed Forces (other than administrative and support functions).

The committee expects the Secretary will make available to the Office and the Administrator other resources in the Department for the improvement of the Dependents Schools, including child nutrition programs, vocational education programs, education of the handicapped services, and other programs for the improvement of academic facilities and personnel.

Section 211. Office of Indian Education

This section establishes the Office of Indian Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education.

The Secretary is required to delegate to the Assistant Secretary all functions transferred to the Department relating to education in the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Also, the Assistant Secretary will administer the functions of the existing Office of Indian Education and the Office of the Deputy Commissioner of Education for Indian Education in the U.S. Office of Education in HEW. Although this section requires the delegation of all Indian education functions transferred under this act to the Assistant Secretary except for administrative and support functions, the committee intends that these support functions include only those which provide for immediate facilities and support services relating to the Office of Indian Education itself, not those relating to the operation of Indian schools in the field (which the committee intends should be transferred to the Office).

This section specifically provides that the transfer of functions will not modify or eliminate any eligibility requirements or standards in effect before the transfer. The definition of an "Indian" differs considerably between HEW and the BIA. The committee intends that where Indian education programs and services presently serve only those tribes granted recognition by the Federal Government, they shall continue to serve those Indian people. For those programs authorized under the Indian Education Act, where a broader definition of "Indian" is used, that statutory definition shall continue to exist. The committee believes there is a strong need to tighten the latter definition. But such action can be taken only after the most careful study and with extensive consultation with Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. The Assistant Secretary should go to great lengths to insure these two eligibility requirements and standards are continued in the Office. The committee expects the administration of the BIA transferred services and the OE transferred programs will remain distinct and separate under the Assistant Secretary until such time as Congress provides otherwise. The problem of varying definitions of an "Indian" is one that should be thoroughly examined, and remedied in the near future.

The committee expects the Department of Education will not violate the trust responsibility of the U.S. Government for Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. The committee views this provision as being of paramount importance in both the creation of the Department and the new Office of Indian Education. The trust responsibility stems directly from the Federal Government's agreements and treaties signed with Indian tribes. The Department of Education, under this section, is ordered by Congress to strictly adhere to the trust responsibility. The Department, the Assistant Secretary, and the Office of Indian Education are legally and morally bound and obligated to meet the special and unique needs of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. The committee intends that the transfer of the BIA education functions and their consolidation in the new Office of Indian Education will not in any way threaten the trust responsibility and will improve Indian education.

This section also mandates coordination and consultation between the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education and the Assistant Secretary in the Department of the Interior who has responsibility for Indian Affairs. The committee believes close and strong cooperation between these two top Federal Indian officials is imperative. There will be instances where some of the educational facilities under the purview of the Department of Education will require light support services, such as the maintenance of a road on a reservation to a school.

The committee intends that there be developed a viable working relationship between the two Assistant Secretaries to rapidly eliminate any logistical concerns that might arise. The Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs will be expected to do everything in his or her power to assist in the provision of educational services to Indian people, and to insure that the transfer of functions from the BIA be carried out with diligence and efficiency.

The Assistant Secretary for Indian Education is also mandated to increase the level of local control of Indian education by Indian people. The committee intends that this doctrine be the pervasive philosophy of the new Department and the Office of Indian Education. It is extremely important that Indian people assume more control, operation, input, and self-determination over the schools that serve their children. In this regard, the Assistant Secretary should make strong efforts to encourage more contracting under the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act. Funding arrangements for all programs and services of the Office should be made as much as possible directly between the Office and the tribes or Indian organizations. The committee does not approve of Indian education funds administered by the Office being channeled through State education agencies because the Federal Government has a direct relationship with Indian tribes.

The committee understands that some programs benefitting Indians should be administered outside the Office of Indian Education. For example, the ESEA title I funds that support Indian education are properly administered by the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education. However, the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education has an important role to play in helping to shape those programs outside his immediate domain so as to be more appropriate to Indian needs.

Last, this section provides for the transmittal to Congress every 3 years of a comprehensive plan for the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. The committee believes such a plan will be an important function of the Office and the Assistant Secretary. The primary purpose of the consolidation of Indian education functions under this legislation is to facilitate the development of a comprehensive Federal strategy for Indian education—long a victim of neglect. The committee expects such a plan will be developed with extensive consultation with Indian tribes and organizations. Such plan should also include an analysis of the progress of Indian education, and include recommendations for the improvement of Indian education.

Section 212. Office of Educational Research and Improvement

Section 212 establishes an Office of Educational Research and Improvement, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Research and Improvement. The section states that the Secretary shall delegate to this Assistant Secretary all functions relating to the fund for the improvement of postsecondary education, those functions transferred which relate to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations; and the science education functions transferred intact from the National Science Foundation.

In establishing this Office, the committee recognizes the important role of the Federal Government in assisting research and development activities which are designed to improve education, public understanding, and the capacities of educational institutions. This Office will integrate and coordinate the wide range of research, development, and demonstration programs.

The programs proposed for inclusion in the new Office are included because their overall missions fit into and would complement the new Office. Although this section does not specifically place the National Institute of Education into this Office, the committee feels this placement is appropriate. It recommends that the authorizing committees, in conjunction with reauthorizing legislation for the fund for the improvement of postsecondary education and the National Institutes of Education, consider the renewal for these programs within an organization and decisionmaking framework which will ultimately enhance the research role for the Department.

Additionally, the Assistant Secretary shall perform such other duties as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 213. Office of Inspector General

Section 213 establishes in the Department an Office of Inspector General, to be administered by the Inspector General appointed under section 202(c).

The Inspector General shall carry out the functions of the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to education transferred to the Secretary which are now vested in the Inspector General of HEW. In addition, the Inspector General will have this same authority with respect to the functions of the Secretary or of the Department, or of any officer or component thereof which are transferred to the Department.

This section insures that the Inspector General for the Department will have the same authority as that now vested in the Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. To insure that the Inspector General possesses the same independence that is now vested in HEW's Inspector General, the section provides that the Inspector General shall be appointed and removed in the same manner, and have the same status as the HEW Inspector General. Thus, the Inspector General would be appointed by the President and removed solely by the President.

It is the committee's intent that the Inspector General function be a strong component in the new Department. Since this Department will spend more than $17 billion in Federal moneys, it is the committee's view that the Inspector General's office actively and thoroughly investigate any abuses or mismanagement of funds.

Also, at the present time, the House of Representatives has passed a bill providing for an Inspector General in various other Federal departments. The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee has ordered reported a similar bill. The committee recommends that if the Inspector General bill is enacted, this bill be conformed to the new statute.

Section 214. Office of General Counsel

This section establishes an Office of General Counsel, to be administered by the General Counsel.

The General Counsel shall perform necessary duties with respect to legal assistance to the Secretary concerning the programs and policies of the Department and any other additional duties the Secretary feels are appropriate for this Office.

Section 215. Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education

Section 215 establishes within the Department an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The purpose of the Council is to conduct studies and make recommendations to the Secretary and the President concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education.

The functions of the Council are to provide a forum for the development of intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education; make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs and education-related programs; promote better intergovernmental relations; assess Federal policies and make recommendations to insure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

The Council is also required to submit a report every 2 years to Congress, the President, and the Secretary which reviews the impact of Federal education policies upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions, and assess the achievement of Federal objectives in education as well as any adverse consequences of Federal actions upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

The Council would assist the Secretary in conducting conferences and similar activities to assess the contributions of each level of government to the delivery of equitable, high-quality, and effective education.

The Council's membership shall be composed of 22 members, appointed by the President. Not more than 11 of the members of the Council may be members of the same political party. Six members would be chosen from elected State, local, and tribal officials; six members would be selected from the public, including parents, students, and public interest groups; five members would be from among representatives of public and nonpublic preschool, elementary, and secondary educational institutions, including school board members, administrators, and teachers; and five members would be chosen from among representatives of public and nonpublic postsecondary educational institutions, including board members, administrators, and teachers.

In making appointments to the Council, the President shall consult with representatives of state and local governmental authorities who do have a direct responsibility in education policy decisions at the State and local levels. Such groups would include the National Governor's Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, and the United States Conference of Mayors. This consultation is not limited, however, to the organizations specified. It is the committee's view that the President should also consult with other groups which are representatives of the membership selected to the Council. Such organizations would include educational organizations, citizens' public interest groups, including civil rights groups, tribal organizations and student groups. The committee feels this consultation is important in order to insure the type of broad-based representation on the Council which is necessary to carry out its stated objectives in bringing the opinions and ideas of those persons involved in the educational process to the attention of the Department.

Members appointed to the Council would be appointed for four year terms and would have a bipartisan representation. Not more than 11 members appointed to the Council would be from the same political party.

If such a member appointed to the Council is an elected official, the member may serve on the Council to the expiration of his or her appointment to the Council.

If the Council wishes, it may review rules or regulations proposed by the Department concerning Federal education programs. The purpose of the Council's review would be to determine the impact of rules or regulations on State, local and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions. The review of the regulations would have to be conducted in accordance with the specified time allowed for public comment on the rules or regulations, as specified according to the Department's procedures. In conjunction with this provision, the Council may establish a subcommittee for the purposes of the review. The Council may receive and consider comments by affected parties on the proposed rules or regulations.

The Council may submit a report containing the results of its review to the Secretary within the time established for public comment. The Council's review would be placed on the public record. If such a report is submitted to the Secretary, the Secretary would be required to submit a written public response which addresses the Council's recommendations and contains a statement of the reasons why the Secretary will or will not incorporate the recommendations in the rule or regulation.

The Council's review should be limited to those rules or regulations the Council feels significantly impact upon intergovernmental relations to such an extent that they warrant special attention by the Council.

The section prescribes that the per diem paid to the Council members will be the equivalent of the daily rate for a GS–18.

The Council is authorized to hold hearings and request the attendance and testimony of witnesses, as well as the cooperation and assistance of other Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities.

The Secretary would be required to appoint an executive director to be compensated at the rate provided for a GS–17. The Secretary should seek the approval of the Council in making the choice of the executive director. In addition, the Secretary is required to provide the Council with additional staff, facilities, and assistance as needed to carry out the Council's activities.

Section 216. Federal Interagency Committee on Education

This section establishes the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to conduct studies and make recommendations in order to assure the effective coordination of Federal programs affecting education.

The committee would be composed of at least 17 members. In order to provide more opportunity for greater coordination, the Secretary could expand this number to include other agencies involved in other education-related programs. One member would be the Secretary, who would be the chairman of the committee. Sixteen members would be representatives of the following departments and agencies: Department of Agriculture, Department of Commerce, Department of Defense, Department of Energy, Department of Justice, Department of Health and Welfare, Department of the Interior, Department of Labor, Department of State, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, National Endowment for the Arts, National Endowment for the Humanities, National Science Foundation, Veterans Administration, Commission on Civil Rights, and Environmental Protection Agency.

The committee believes the coordination of Federal education programs outside the Department with those inside will be a critically important function of the Department and the Secretary. One of the basic reasons for the creation of the Department of Education is to improve coordination of education at the Federal level.

FICE should become a viable, active tool of the Secretary in eliminating duplication of effort between the Department and other Federal agencies. The committee fully expects the Secretary will take an active role in the operation and work of FICE. That is the purpose of naming the Secretary of Education as the chairperson. FICE should be an important mechanism for the conduct of comprehensive studies on the Federal role in education, and where the effort can be streamlined.

The committee further expects the agencies designated to be represented on FICE in the legislation will also take active roles in improving coordination and performance of their education programs. The committee has specifically required these agencies to appoint senior officials involved in policymaking functions to represent them on FICE. FICE will be effective only as long as it has as members individuals who hold significant policy and decisionmaking authority.

Although the bill requires FICE to meet at least twice each year, the committee expects the Secretary will utilize FICE more often, especially in the first 3 years of the life of the new Department, when relationships among the many Federal agencies involved in education are developing and becoming formalized.

This section also mandates FICE to conduct a study concerning the need for improved coordination between all federally funded vocational education and training programs. FICE is required to report its findings to Congress within 2 years. The committee intends that FICE devote much attention to and conduct an extensive investigation of the relationship between vocational education programs in the Department with other vocational-oriented programs in the Department of Labor. The committee has been made aware of lack of coordination and duplication of effort between the vocational education and training programs of HEW and the Department of Labor. A strong, coordinated vocational education and training effort is important to the economic growth of the nation.

TITLE III—TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS

Section 301. Transfers from HEW

Section 301(a) transfers all officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, grants, property, and records as are determined by the Office of Management and Budget Director are to be employed, held, or used primarily on connection with any function of the following agencies, offices, or parts of agencies or offices:

(1) the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the National Institute of Education;

(2) the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education, including the National Center for Education Statistics;

(3) the Institute of Museum Services of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(4) any advisory committee in the Department of HEW giving advice and making recommendations principally concerning education; and

(5) the Office of Handicapped Individuals of the Department of HEW.

Subsection 301(b)(1) transfers to the Secretary all functions of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare or the Secretary, the Assistant Secretary for Education, or the Commissioner of Education of the Department with respect to the following:

(A) the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the National Institute of Education. (The Education Division was created by the Education Amendments of 1972 to coordinate functions of the U.S. Office of Education and the National Institute of Education (NIE). Authorization for NIE expires at the close of Fiscal Year 1979.)

(B) the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education, including the National Center for Education Statistics. (The Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education (ASE) coordinates all Education Division functions. ASE is responsible for providing administrative services to the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education (FIPSE) and for the National Center for Education Statistics (NCES).)

(C) The Institute of Museum Services. (The Institute for Museum Services is authorized by the Arts, Humanities, and Cultural Affairs Act of 1976. It is established within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and delegated to the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education.)

(D) Any advisory committee in HEW is giving advice and making recommendations principally concerning education.

Section 301(b)(2)(A) transfers all functions of the Department of HEW or the Secretary of HEW principally involving education including functions—

(i) Under the General Education Provisions Act, including section 404 relating to the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education (FIPSE). (The authorization for FIPSE expires at the close of fiscal year 1979.)

(ii) Under section 808 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. Section 808 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, as amended, authorizes grants for demonstration projects to improve school nutrition and health services for children from low-income families. (No appropriations have been requested over the last several years; functions can be funded under ESEA title IV, Educational Admendments of 1974.)

(iii) Under the Emergency School Aid Act. The Emergency School Aid Act, authorized by title VII of Public Law 92–318, the Education Amendments of 1972, provides grants to educational agencies for the purposes of reducing minority group isolation and for improving the quality of education for all children. Authority is assigned to the Assistant Secretary for Education. (Education Amendments of 1978 alter program characteristics.)

(iv) Under the Higher Education Act (HEA) of 1965. The Higher Education Act, as amended, includes the following separate authorizations:

Community service and continuing education programs.

College library assistance and library training and research.

Strengthening developing institutions.

Student assistance (basic education opportunity grants, grants to States for State student incentives, special programs for students from disadvantaged backgrounds, veterans' cost-of-instruction payments to institutions, among other grant and loan provisions.)

Teacher corps and teacher training, including teacher centers, training of higher education personnel, fellowships for teachers, vocational educational full-time and part-time training programs.

Financial assistance for the improvement of undergraduate instruction (facilities, television equipment, and minor remodeling).

Construction, reconstruction, and renovation of academic facilities (undergraduate and academic facilities grants and loans).

Cooperative education (grants for programs which provide alternating periods of academic study and of public or private employment).

Graduate programs (research and public service fellowships and stipends, and associated institutional assistance grants).

Establishment and expansion of community colleges (State planning grants, and grants to institutions).

Law school clinical experience programs (planning,, training, equipment, and library resources, stipends.)

General provisions (statewide planning grants, advisory council on graduate education).)

(v) Under the Emergency Insured Student Loan Act of 1969. (The Emergency Insured Student Loan Act of 1969 (Public Law 91-95) authorizes special allowances for lenders with respect to student loans under title IV-B of the HEA of 1965)

(vi) Under the act of August 30, 1890 (7 U.S.C. 321-328). (College-aid annual appropriation: This law provides authority for the Secretary to provide endowments for agriculture and mechanic arts to each State and Territory, Guam, and the Virgin Islands).

(vii) Under the Environmental Education Act. (The Environmental Education Act (Public Law 91-516), as amended, authorizes programs to encourage understanding of policies, and support activities designed to improve environmental and ecological understanding; (curriculum development, training of teachers, community programs). This act will be reauthorized in 1978.)

(viii) Under the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act, except functions under section 5. (The Alcohol and Drug Abuse

Education Act (Public Law 91-527), as amended, authorizes grants or contracts to educational and community agencies to develop materials and support other educational activities designed to prevent drug abuses.

(ix) Under the International Education Act of 1966. (The International Education Act of 1966 (Public Law 89-698), as amended, provides authority for granting funds for advanced and undergraduate international studies. To date, no funds have been appropriated.)

(x) Under the National Defense Education Act of 1958. (The National Defense Education Act of 1958 (Public Law 85-864), as amended, provides authority for strengthening instruction in science, mathematics, modern foreign language, and other critical subjects. It also permits loans to nonprofit private schools, and support for guidance, counseling, and testing services. Recently, these activities have been funded under the grant-consolidation provisions of title IV of ESEA Amendments of 1974.)

(xi) Under the Education of the Handicapped Act. For a discussion of the programs administered under this act, see areas of discussion, vocational rehabilitation, page 42 of this report.

(xii) Under the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science Act. (The National Commission on Libraries and Information Science Act (Public Law 91-345) authorizes establishment of a commission which operates outside (as an independent agency) HEW. It provides advice to the President and Congress, conducts studies, surveys, and conducts meetings. It assumes responsibility for coordinating and administering the White House Conference on Library and Information Science (Public Law 93-568), to be held not later than 1978. HEW's role is to provide the Commission with "necessary administrative services . . .")

(xiii) Under the Vocational Education Act of 1963. The Vocational Education Act of 1963, as amended, is designed to improve the quality of vocational education. The majority of funds are provided to States in basic, formula-drive grants; States prepare State plans. Other discretionary and categorical grant programs under this Act include:

Special programs for disadvantaged;
Consumer and homemaking;
Innovation, research, and development projects;
Personnel development;
Bilingual vocational training; and
Adult education and special studies.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(B) transfers part B of title V of the Economic Act of 1964.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(C) transfers the functions administered by the secretary or the Office for Civil Rights for the enforcement of civil rights laws and educational orders relating to the functions transferred elsewhere in the bill.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(D) transfers the Office of Inspector General of HEW as it relates to the functions transferred by this section.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(E) transfers all laws dealing with the relationship between Gallaudet College (including the Model Secondary School for the Deaf), Howard University, the American Printing House for the Blind, the National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and the Department of HEW.

Through the transfer of these special institutions, the committee intends that the new Department continue to allow these institutions maximum flexibility, independence, and autonomy in determining their educational program and system. The Secretary should consider coordinating the oversight of Gallaudet College, National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and American Printing House for the Blind with the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. Coordination of oversight of Howard University would be best linked with the Office of Postsecondary Education.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(F) transfers functions under subpart A of part IV of title III of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(G) transfers functions under subparts II and III of part B of title VIII of the Public Health Service Act, relating to the establishment of student loan funds and scholarship grant programs for schools of nursing and under subparts I and II of part C of title VII of such act, relating to the establishment of student loan insurance and student loan funds for schools of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, pharmacy, podiatry, optometry, or veterinary medicine.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(H) transfers the functions being administered by the Secretary of HEW or by the Commissioner of the Rehabilitation Services Administration (RSA) under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. RSA is presently located in HEW. This section also transfers the Randolph-Sheppard vending facility program, which is administered by the Commissioner but is not authorized by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. This section does not transfer vocational rehabilitation services for social security disability beneficiaries, vocational rehabilitation services for supplemental security income beneficiaries, or the developmental disabilities programs.

Subsection 301(b)(3) transfers the functions of the National Institute of Education.

Subsection 301(b)(4) transfers the functions of the Institute of Museum Services.

In describing the functions of the Department of Education, the committee has attempted to provide a complete list of existing functions now located in HEW that would appropriately be transferred to the Department. Subsection (b)(2) pertains to functions of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to be transferred and describes in specific terms the legislative authorities the committee expects the new Department to administer. The subsection is not intended as a broad authority permitting transfer, by administrative determination, of additional functions up to now clearly associated with health or welfare programs of the Department.

In addition, it is the committee's intent that prior experience requirements for employees performing specified functions be maintained as Congress intended. Examples are requirements in section 160(b) of the Vocational Education Act of 1963 (20 U.S.C. 2390(b)) that certain individuals performing vocational education functions have prior experience in the fields of junior and community college education, occupational guidance and counseling, and engineering.

Section 302. Transfers of functions from the Department of Agriculture

This section transfers the child nutrition programs authorized under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act from the Department of Agriculture, except for commodity distribution and the women-infants-children (WIC) program.

In addition, this section directs the Secretary of Education and the Secretary of Agriculture to consult with one another on the preferences of States and localities for commodities. It also requires the Secretary of Education to consult with Federal agencies concerned with nutrition policy when taking actions that affect the nutrition standards used in these programs.

The committee intends that the transfer of these school and child nutrition programs be made to consolidate the major Federal education programs affecting the Nation's schools in order to reduce duplicative and burdensome rules, regulations, and paperwork. The committee believes that by forming a uniform administrative chain in the administration of school feeding programs (Federal-State-local governments), significant opportunities will arise to cut redtape and increase efficiency.

The committee is also aware that many programs that will be administered by the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education, among others in the Department, have nutrition responsibilities. The committee intends that, by this transfer, improved coordination will result between these programs.

The committee expects the Assistant Secretary for Child Nutrition will give strong emphasis to developing nutrition education in the Nation's schools. The committee believes the key to reducing plate waste and improving dietary awareness for children is nutrition education. The expertise in the Department for developing curricula and educational materials should be made available to the Assistant Secretary for instituting more nutrition education.

An important part of the child feeding programs is the distribution of surplus agricultural commodities to the schools and other institutions. The committee believes the commodity program is best left in USDA. USDA has the expertise in purchasing surplus commodities, and its services in this field are used by other Federal agencies successfully. The commodities must be of high quality and contribute to the nutrition of the Nation's children. There must be consultation and coordination between the Department and USDA on the needs and preferences of schools relating to the commodity program. The committee expects at the minimum, the relationships which now exist between the Food and Nutrition Service in USDA and the two commodity agencies—Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service and Food Safety and Quality Service—should carry over to the Department of Education.

At times, the Assistant Secretary will need the assistance of Federal agencies dealing with nutrition research. The committee intends and expects that such agencies will furnish the technical and research advice and services required for the operation of these programs. In taking action affecting the existing nutrition standards, the Assistant Secretary shall make use of these facilities and consult with those Federal agencies having nutrition responsibilities. Moreover, the committee expects that the extensive research resources of the Department of Education will also be utilized to help assess and improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the child nutrition programs.

The nutrition services provided by the child nutrition programs are critical to the proper development of the Nation's children and are important responsibilities of the schools. The committee believes that the scope of the Department should reflect these responsibilities. Further, the committee expects that the Department will actively seek to promote the full integration of these child nutrition programs into the educational process.

This section also transfers from the Department of Agriculture the graduate school.

The committee expects that the transfer will have little effect on the operation of the graduate school. The Secretary should allow the graduate school the same amount of independence and autonomy it has enjoyed under the USDA. Responsibility for policy and curriculum, and other operational authorities, should be the prerogative of the graduate school's board of trustees, not the Department.

The committee recommends complementary relationships should develop between the graduate school and the entire Department. Appropriate facilities should be made available for the continued efficient operation of the graduate school. The committee expects that the Department will share library, classroom, demonstration and audiovisual facilities with the graduate school and its faculty and students. Sharing resources should in no way disrupt or interfere with activities and program operations assigned to the Department by law.

Coordination of the programs of the Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education concerning occupational and community education with those of the graduate school—as an institution specializing in continuing education—would be desirable and beneficial.

The continuing prosperity and expansion of the graduate school should be the major objective of the Secretary.

Section 303. Transfers of functions from the Department of the Interior

This section transfers all functions of the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of the Interior relating to the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts.

The transfer of functions relating to the operation, construction, and maintenance of schools and dormitories would become effective whenever the President prescribes, but in no case later than 3 years after the effective date of this act. Within 1 year after the date of enactment, the Secretary would transmit to Congress a plan, developed in consultation with the affected tribes, Indian organizations, and other groups, for effecting these particular transfers.

In making the transfer of education functions from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the committee intends that all functions not relating to the operation, construction, and maintenance of the BIA school system be transferred to the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education in the new Department on the effective date of this legislation.

By "all functions of the Secretary of the Interior . . . relating to the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts," the committee wants to make clear that this also includes any financial assistance to public schools and tribally operated schools authorized under the so-called Johnson-O'Malley Act. The committee understands that approximately $33 million was spent under this program in fiscal year 1978 for educational assistance.

The committee has provided for a 3-year phase-in period for the transfer of all functions relating to the operation and maintenance of the BIA schools. The legislation also provides that the Assistant Secretary, through the Secretary, shall transmit to Congress a comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer.

The 3-year phase-in period is necessary for the orderly and efficient transfer of the BIA schools. The committee believes the phase-in period will result in little or no disruption or adverse effects to the schools.

Much emphasis and diligence should be placed on developing the comprehensive plan for transfer. The committee stresses the importance of consultation with Indian tribes and organizations on the transfer. The plan must have the input of Indian people for it to be successful. The plan should also contain recommendations for increasing the level of control and participation of Indian education by Indians themselves. The committee believes one important aspect of the plan shall be the recommendations of the Assistant Secretary on the possible creation of an all-Indian board or commission to play a significant role in the development of policy on the Federal level. The committee believes it is important to consider the need for the creation of such a high-level Indian education panel to advise the Secretary and the Office of Indian Education. The committee expects the Assistant Secretary and the Secretary will transmit to the Congress their recommendations for such a board, but only after having actively solicited the input of Indian people on the makeup, powers, and structure of such a board.

The committee further intends that support services for the schools also be transferred during the phase-in period. All functions relating to construction, policy development, and planning, evaluation, and budget should be transferred. The committee will monitor the 3-year phase-in for its efficiency, and for the close cooperation it expects to develop between the Interior Department and the Department of Education.

This section provides for the transfer of the Department of Defense overseas dependents schools. This section also authorizes the operation of the dependents schools, which in the past have been authorized only by appropriation legislation. The Secretary is required to develop a comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer of the schools within 1 year of the date of enactment.

The committee recognizes the operation of the dependents schools will require careful analysis before a plan of transfer can be designed and executed. During this transition the Congress expects the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Education to work closely to assure a smooth transfer of the schools and to avoid any disruption to the education programs conducted in the schools. In addition, section 505(a) of the bill requires that agreements between the schools and the Armed Forces in existence at the time the Department of Education is established shall remain in effect until new agreements are negotiated as part of the planned transfer of the schools.

The administrative reorganization of the schools which is currently underway should continue, and should not be disrupted during the transitional period.

The section requires that the comprehensive plan for transfer include recommendations for increasing the participation of parents, educators, students, school administrators, and military personnel in the operation and development of the schools. The committee believes it is important to consider the need for the creation of a board or commission, made up of the aforementioned individuals, to guarantee more input in the development of policy and in the operation of the schools by those involved with the educational process. Such a board would operate at the Federal level, and could have responsibilities similar to that of a State board of education. The committee expects the Secretary will transmit to Congress his or her recommendations, developed after much study and consultation with all affected parties, for the structure and authority of such a board. These recommendations should be contained within the comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer of the schools.

Section 305. Transfers of functions from the National Science Foundation

Subsection (a) transfers certain programs of the National Science Foundation (NSF) or of the Director of the National Science Foundation relating to science education.

It does not transfer programs with respect to graduate fellowships and traineeships integral to the support of scientific research and development; programs concerned with ethical, value, and science policy issues; or those for communicating science values to nonscientists.

Subsection (b) authorizes the Secretary to conduct the programs transferred by subsection (a). Only certain existing National Science Foundation science education programs are being transferred; NSF will retain the function and the right to continue its activity in appropriate science education programs.

In subsection (c) the Secretary is mandated to consult with the Director of NSF when conducting the programs transferred under this section.

Subsection (d), which is related to subsection (b), assures that NSF retains the authority to institute new programs under section 3(a)(1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950, even though certain of its existing programs are being transferred to the new Department.

Section 306. Transfers of programs from the Department of Justice

This section transfers the student loan and grant programs known as the Law Enforcement and Education Program and the Law Enforcement Interim Program from the Department of Justice.

Section 307. Transfers of functions from the Department of Housing and Urban Development

This section transfers the administration of college housing loans from the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Through the transfer, the committee expects that the present high level of efficiency will be maintained in the administration of the program. The complex legal agreements and procedures used by HUD for the program should not be disrupted by the transfer. The committee intends that the transfer will not change the existing relationships between HUD and the Federal Reserve Bank, which serves as the fiscal agent for the program. Further, the committee recommends the Secretary coordinate and administer together the college housing program and the higher education facilities loan and insurance fund in the new Department to facilitate the development of a consolidated assistance program for construction of higher education facilities.

Section 308. Transfer of the Advisory Council on Education Statistics

This section transfers personnel, assets, and functions of the Advisory Council on Education Statistics.

Section 309. Effects of transfers

Any function of an officer or agency transferred will include any aspect vested in a subordinate of the officer or in a component of the agency.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

Part A—Personnel Provisions

Section 401. Officers and employees

Subsection (a) authorizes the Secretary to appoint and fix the compensation of officers and employees necessary to carry out the functions of the Secretary and the Department, subject to the civil service laws.

Subsection (b) provides for the transfer to the Department of Education of the "supergrade" (GS–16, 17, and 18) positions related to existing programs that are being transferred to the Department. These positions exist in their current locations pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 5108(a). Because the positions already have been designated by the Civil Service Commission, the provision permits the Secretary to appoint the incumbents to similar positions in the Department without requiring new reappointment authority. Paragraph (3) assures that this exception will apply only with regard to these individuals.

Subsection (c) authorizes certain excepted appointments for use in the Office of Educational Research and Improvement generally following those now available for programs of the National Institute of Education and the National Science Foundation that are being transferred to the Department. This subsection also authorizes the appointment of up to 15 transitional employees on an excepted basis.

Subsection (d) authorizes the appointment, in conformity with the civil service laws, or 21 supergrade employes to replace 21 such positions created by law in connection with programs being transferred to the Department. In addition, it authorizes 50 new supergrade positions, in conformity with the civil service laws. The Committee feels the additional 50 supergrade positions are necessary due to the fact that projected overhead functions for the department are now extremely lean in supergrades. For example, only five supergrade positions are now available for the administration of budget functions, Major additional needs for the overhead functions of the General Counsel, Inspector General, Administration and Budget, Regional Offices and the Immediate Office of the Secretary would be needed. The Department would require additional supergrade positions for the overseas schools, which have nearly 10,000 employees, the Indian schools, which have nearly 9,000 employees and major grant making responsibilities and for the nutrition programs which would account for almost $3 billion in programs and which would be administered by 600 personnel. Currently these programs only have authority to hire five supergrades. The Committee does not expect additional supergrades to be requested for the Education Division program activities.

In terms of budget outlays, the Department will be the fourth largest domestic department in terms of outlays with authority to hire the smallest number of supergrades, even with the addition of these positions. The 21 recreated positions will retain their existing grade levels, subject to the authority of the Secretary to reevaluate such levels from time to time. In assigning the supergrade positions particular grade levels under subsection (d), other than those used to replace positions previously established by law within the Education Division, 63 percent would be deemed GS-16's, 25 percent GS-17's, and 12 percent GS-18's.

Subsection (e) provides all Indian preference hiring laws which are now in effect will continue to remain in effect after enactment.

The committee intends that the Office of Indian Education take strong steps to institute Indian preference in its employment practices. Indian preference should apply to all the Office's functions. Responsibility for insuring Indian preference is enforced should be given to the Office for Civil Rights.

Subsection (f) is concerned with the authorization for and compensation of voluntary personnel.

Section 402. Experts and consultants

This section allows the Secretary to obtain the services of experts and consultants.

Part B—General Provisions

Section 411. Authority of the Secretary

This section provides that where a function is transferred to the Secretary, there are available to the Secretary the same authorities for carrying out the function that were available to the agency or officer from which the function was transferred.

Section 412. Delegation

Section 412 authorizes the Secretary to delegate functions to other officers and employees of the Department and to authorize them to delegate such functions further (unless the act provides otherwise). The delegation of the Secretary's authority to another officer or employee does not relieve the Secretary of ultimate responsibility for the exercise of the function, nor is this section intended to be inconsistent with the requirements for redelegation of functions provided for in section 413.

Section 413. Reorganization

Section 413 contains provisions governing reorganization of offices and functions within the Department.

Subsection (a) generally authorizes the Secretary to allocate or reallocate functions among the officers of the Department and to establish, consolidate, alter, or discontinue organizational entities within the Department that may be necessary or appropriate. This authority is allowed with certain exceptions stated in this section. The reorganization must be consistent with section 202 (g) of this act which requires the President, in submitting nominees to executive-level positions established in the bill, to state the particular functions of the Department the individual will exercise upon taking office. This reorganization authority is subject to section 202(g) to insure that functions required to be performed by a particular officer by this act will continue to be performed by such officer even if the Secretary chooses to reorganize the Department.

Except for the procedure provided for by subsection (b), section 413 does not allow the Secretary to allocate or reallocate functions or to establish, consolidate, alter, or discontinue organizational entities within the Department if such entities or functions with respect to such entities are established by statute. The abolition of organizational entities established by this act and the alteration or the delegation of functions under this act to any specific organizational entity is also prohibited.

Subsection (b) provides an exception with respect to the following offices and the functions attached to those offices named: Office of Bilingual Education; Teacher Corps; Community College Unit; National Center for Education Statistics; Office of Career Education; National Institute of Education; Office of Environmental Educa-Resources; Institute of Museum Services; and administrative units for guidance and counseling programs, the veterans' cost of instruction program, and the program for the gifted and talented children.

In the case of the offices listed, the Secretary could not alter, consolidate, or discontinue any organizational entity or reallocate any function vested by statute in such an entity unless the Secretary notifies the Senate Committee on Human Resources and the House Committee on Education and Labor 90 days in advance of such action. The notice must contain a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to the reorganization and the supportive facts and circumstances justifying such a proposed action.

Subsection (c) provides that on the effective date of the act, the Educational Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the Office of Education and its Bureau of Education for the Handicapped, Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education, and Office of Indian Education, and the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education of that Department shall lapse.

The purpose of this section is to give the Secretary specifically stated flexibility with respect to certain offices all previously existing within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and transferred to the Department of Education. Under ordinary circumstances, the Secretary would be prevented from reorganizing or reallocating functions where Congress has specifically provided that such functions be performed by particular entities created by legislation. The committee was concerned that any flexibility given to the Secretary pertaining to a reorganization of functions or offices created by statute be subject to the legislative process or subject to reorganization plan. However, a limited exception is stated in this section, which provides for certain flexibility on the part of the Secretary with respect to the offices or units named in the section. This limited authority does not extend to the abolition of functions under any circumstances and gives the Secretary some flexibility to reorganize certain functions within the Department due to the fact that a new structure has been established by the bill and that existing functions or units might not be placed appropriately in the context of the new Department, if the Secretary is not provided some flexibility.

Section 414. Reporting relationships

This section gives the Secretary flexibility, consistent with section 413, with regard to reporting relationships with subordinate officers. Subsection (a) provides (subject to the limitations of section 413, but notwithstanding the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221 et seq.) or any other act) that any officer or employee of the Department whose functions are transferred by the act and who was previously required to report to either the Commissioner of Education of HEW will report to the Secretary. Subsection (b) authorizes the Secretary to delegate any such reporting requirement to any other officer or employee of the Department.

Section 415. Rules

This section authorizes the Secretary to prescribe rules and regulations in connection with the functions of the Secretary of the Department. The promulgation of rules and regulations will be subject to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 551 et seq.)

Section 416. Contracts

This section allows the Secretary to enter into and perform contracts, grants, leases, cooperative agreements, or other similar transactions to the extent and to the amount provided for in advance under appropriate acts.

Subsection (b) provides that the restricting of contracting and related authority to those funded in advance by appropriations is not intended to apply to existing programs, nor to existing contract authorities under existing law. Laws granting specific contract authority also will continue to apply.

Section 417. Technical advice

This section authorizes the Secretary to provide technical assistance with respect to any program or function of the Secretary or the Department. The Secretary must also provide, upon request, technical assistance to any State desiring to develop comprehensive plans applicable to two or more programs administered by the Department.

Section 418. Regional and field offices

The Secretary may establish, maintain, alter, or discontinue regional or other field offices.

Section 419. Acquisition and maintenance of property

This section allows the Secretary to acquire and maintain schools and related facilities and accommodations for employees of the Department and their dependents only to the extent the facilities are of a special purpose nature that cannot readily be reassigned for similar Federal activities and are not otherwise available for assignment to the Department by the Administrator of General Services.

Section 420. Facilities at remote locations

This section authorizes the Secretary to provide various services (such as medicine, food and dining facilites) to employees and their dependents stationed at remote locations when these services are not otherwise available.

Section 421. Use of facilities

This section grants the Secretary the power to use the research equipment, services, and facilities of the United States or of any State Indian tribe, or tribal organization, or foreign government, with its consent.

The Secretary may also permit various entities to use the Department's property for Department purposes.

Section 422. Copyrights and patents

This section authorizes the Secretary to acquire copyrights, patents licenses, and releases for the Department's use.

Section 423. Gifts and bequests

This section allows the Secretary to use gifts for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department.

Section 424. Working capital fund

This section authorizes the Secretary to establish a working capital fund for common administrative services.

Section 425. Funds transfer

When the Secretary is authorized in an appropriation act he or she may transfer funds from one appropriation to another within the Department as long as no appropriation either increases or decreases by more than 5 percent and no transfer results in increasing the appropriation above the amount authorized.

Section 426. Seal of Department

This section provides for the Secretary to approve a design for a seal for the Department.

Section 427. Annual report

Section 427 requires the Secretary, as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year, to prepare and transmit a report to the President for transmission to the Congress concerning the activities of the Department during that fiscal year. The report will include a statement of the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department which are consistent with the findings and purposes of this act; contain an assessment of the progress made during that fiscal year and anticipated future progress toward the attainment of the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department specified in the findings and purposes; the effective and efficient management of the Department; and the coordination of the functions of the Department.

The report will also analyze objective data concerning changing trends in education; areas of critical concern; and the performance of the American educational system.

In addition the report will include budget projections for the 5 fiscal years succeeding the fiscal year for which the report is made, and it will contain a separate section on the recommendations for the fiscal year for which the report is made of the Federal Interagency Committee on Education regarding the improvement of the coordination and development of Federal education programs.

Section 448 of the General Education Provisions Act allows the Commissioner to submit within the Commissioner's annual report recommendations for the abolition or combination of advisory committee functions. Since Section 427 is a successor to the Commissioner's annual report, the Committee expects the Secretary will submit to the Congress any such recommendations on advisory committees in the annual report.

In preparing and developing this report the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consult with members of the public. Within 90 days after the issuance of the report, the Secretary will hold public hearings. In the course of the Secretary's consultation, the Secretary may reimburse any person for expenses reasonably incurred if such person has made or is likely to make a material contribution to the work of the Department or could not otherwise participate fully and effectively in the consultation.

Section 428. Relationship to General Education Provisions Act

Section 428 provides the General Education Provisions Act shall apply only to functions transferred by this act to which the GEPA applies immediately prior to the date of enactment (except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.)

Section 429. Authorization of appropriations

This section authorizes to be appropriated whatever sums may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and to enable the Secretary to administer and manage the Department.

TITLE V—TRANSITIONAL, SAVINGS, AND CONFORMING PROVISIONS

Section 501. Transfer and allocations of appropriations and personnel

501(a) provides that all personnel, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended sums connected with the functions transferred by this act are also transferred. Unexpended funds would be used only for the purposes for which they were originally authorized and appropriated.

Section (b) provides positions expressly specified by statute or reorganization plan to carry out functions transferred by this act, the personnel occupying those positions on the effective date of this act, and the personnel authorized to receive compensation in those positions at the rate prescribed for offices and positions at level I, II, III, IV, or V of the executive schedule on the effective date of this act, will be subject to the provisions of section 503 of this act.

Section 502. Effect on personnel

Subsection (a) provides the permanent positions transferred would not be reduced in grade nor would they be separated for at least 1 year (unless stated otherwise in the act).

Subsection (b) further provides that a person who held a position compensated in accordance with the executive schedule and who is appointed in the Department to a position having duties comparable to those he or she performed immediately preceding the appointment will be compensated at least at the same rate as he or she was at the previous employment.

Section 503. Agency terminations

If the functions of an agency, commission, other body, or component thereof have been terminated or transferred, the agency, commission, other body, or component would terminate unless otherwise provided in this act. If this termination occurs, each position and office within the terminated unit would also terminate.

Section 504. Incidental transfers

The Director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) is authorized and directed to make any incidental dispositions of personnel, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended funds, as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act. The Director of OMB will provide for the termination of the affairs of all agencies, commissions, offices, and other bodies terminated by this act and for whatever further measures and dispositions as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act.

This section is not intended to authorize the transfer of any major program authorities not specified in the bill. The provision is designed to cover functions that are necessary to carry out the provisions of the law for the creation of the new Department. The specifications of transfers of personnel, assets, et cetera, in sections 301(a), 304(a)(1), and 308 are not intended to limit the authority contained in this section.

Section 505. Savings provisions

Subsection (a) provides any orders, rules, regulations, determinations, permits, grants, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges which are in effect at the time of enactment will continue in effect until their proper termination or modification.

Subsection (b) provides any proceeding, or application for a license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance affecting a function which is transferred will continue after the transfer.

This section also provides the transfer of any functions by this act would not affect any pending suit. If the suit was against an officer in his official capacity, that officer would be replaced as a party to the suit by the appropriate official of the new Department.

Section 506. Separability

This section provides if any provision of this act, or its application to any person or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remainder of this act nor the application of the provision to other persons or circumstances would be affected.

Section 507. Reference

Any Federal law which refers to a governmental unit the functions of which are transferred to this Department would be deemed to refer to the component of this Department in which this act vests those functions.

Section 508. Technical amendments

This section makes technical amendments in various acts. For example, the Secretary of Education is added to the list of successors to the Presidency, the Department of Education is added to the list of executive departments, and the executive level officers provided for in this act are added to title 5 of the United States Code.

Section 509. Amendment to the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act

This section amends section 306 of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 to read "Consultation with the Secretaries of Education and of Health and Welfare." It provides for the Secretary of Labor to consult with the Secretary of Health and Welfare concerning services of a health and welfare character. The Secretary of Labor would consult with the Secretary of Education concerning services of an educational nature. The Secretary of Education would solicit advice from State educational agencies with respect to education services.

The Secretary of Labor would obtain the approval of the Secretary of Education when arranging for the provision of basic education and vocational training directly.

Section 510.—Contracts with Indian tribal organizations

This section makes the Indian Self-Determination and Educational Assistance Act applicable to the Office of Indian Education in the new Department. It directs the Secretary to enter into contracts, upon request, with any Indian tribe to carry out any or all functions, authorities, and responsibilities transferred to the Secretary from the Department of the Interior, unless the Secretary finds the services to be rendered by the tribe to the beneficiaries will not be satisfactory, or adequate protection of trust resources will not be assured, or the proposed project or function cannot be properly completed or maintained. If the Secretary makes such a finding, he must consider whether the tribe would be deficient in performing the contract with respect to equipment, bookkeeping and accounting procedures, substantive knowledge of the program, community support, adequately trained personnel, or other necessary components of contract performance. The Secretary must state these objections to the tribe within 60 days, provide assistance to overcome the objections, and provide the tribe with a hearing and the right to appeal.

The Secretary is authorized to require any tribe requesting to enter into a contract to obtain adequate liability insurance. The Secretary may make grants to any Indian tribe for: the development, construction, operation, provision or maintenance of adequate education facilities or services; planning, training, evaluation or other activities designed to improve the capacity of a tribal organization to enter into a contract.

The committee intends to strengthen self-determination in the Department of Education. The committee expects the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education and the Secretary will make strong efforts to encourage more tribes to contract for their educational services. The contracting process should be conducted with as little redtape and burdensome restrictions as possible. The Department and the Office of Indian Education should provide more technical assistance to the tribes. There should be strong efforts to minimize contracting problems, including making arrangements to cover startup costs and to determine tribal funding needs in advance.

The committee does not intend, at this time, that the contracting provisions be applied to programs authorized under the Indian Education Act. It would appear those programs are most effective when the grants are awarded on a competitive basis. The Secretary should seriously study, however, the future application of the contracting authority in the comprehensive plan for Indian education required under section 211.

Section 511.—Amendment to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965

A new sentence is added to the end of section 103(c)(2)(B) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. The sentence will read:

> The Secretary of Health and Welfare shall transmit the information required by this subparagraph to the Secretary of Education not later than February 1 of each year.

Section 512.—Redesignation

This section redesignates the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare as the Department of Health and Welfare.

Any reference to Health, Education, and Welfare would refer to Health and Welfare.

With respect to this section the committee, and Senator Humphrey in particular, suggests the administration and members of Congress work together in developing a new name for the Department of Health and Welfare. Senator Humphrey has suggested such considerations as the "Department of Health and Human Development" or the "Department of Health and Human Resources." The committee suggests that renaming the Department of Health and Welfare be given priority consideration.

Section 513. Transition

The Secretary may utilize the services of personnel of the executive branch to facilitate the orderly transfer of functions under this act as long as the Secretary receives the consent of the appropriate department or agency head concerned.

TITLE VI—EFFECTIVE DATE AND INTERIM APPOINTMENTS

Section 601. Effective Date

This act takes effect 180 days after the Secretary first takes office, or earlier if the President so prescribes. However, officers may be nominated and appointed and the Secretary may promulgate regulations any time after the date of enactment.

Section 602. Interim Appointments

If an officer has not entered office by the time this act is effective, the President may designate an acting officer for 120 days or until the office is filled, whichever comes first.

EVALUATION OF REGULATORY IMPACT

Paragraph 5(a) of rule XXXIX requires each report accompanying a bill to evaluate the regulatory impact which would be incurred in carrying out the bill.

S. 991 creates a Cabinet-level Department of Education in the Federal Government. The bill's main purpose is to reorganize the Federal Government to improve governmental efficiency, management, and coordination.

The legislation provides for no new regulatory authority. The committee believes the creation of the Department of Education will not have any new regulatory impact on the provision of Federal educational services and programs. All existing rules and regulations in the programs transferred to the new Department will also be transferred.

One of the committee's goals in the creation of the Department of Education is to achieve a significant measure of consolidation of Federal education programs in order to reduce duplicative and time-consuming paperwork, rules, and regulations.

ESTIMATED COST OF THE LEGISLATION

Pursuant to section 403 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the Congressional Budget Office has reviewed the cost implications of S. 991.

Based on this review, the Director of the CBO estimates the cost of creating the Department of Education will be: $3.3 million in fiscal year 1979; $5.7 million in fiscal year 1980; $8.6 million in fiscal year 1981; $10.441 million in fiscal year 1982; and $11.1 million in fiscal year 1983.

Once the Department is established, an analysis of programs designed to meet Federal objectives in the educational process may serve to point out duplication of effort. Should such duplication be highlighted, every effort should be made to eliminate and consolidate in the areas where duplication exists with an eye toward making the Federal educational effort more effective and coordinated through improved accountability, coordination, and manageability as has been stressed in the creation of the Department, and as a method of containing costs where the need for new programs may arise to meet changing national needs.

Staff additions outside of the executive positions newly authorized in the bill to carry out the administrative functions of the new Department are not anticipated. Cost containment for the new Department is as important an objective as the intent to provide education with the priority needed to insure its appropriate attention, and in fact, is desirable in terms of management, efficiency, and accountability in the Federal involvement in the educational process.

TEXT OF S. 991 AS REPORTED

A BILL To establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Department of Education Organization Act of 1978".

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) education is fundamental to the growth and achievement of the Nation;

(2) there is a continual need to provide equal access by all Americans, especially the disadvantaged and handicapped, to high quality educational opportunities;

(3) the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with State, local, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities, and families;

(4) the dispersion of education programs across a large number of Federal agencies has led to fragmented, duplicative, and often inconsistent Federal policies relating to education;

(5) there is ineffective management of existing Federal resources for State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions;

(6) there is substantial evidence that the quality of education and the development of basic skills are not keeping pace with current demands;

(7) the current structure of the executive branch of the Government fails to recognize the importance of education and does not allow for sufficient Presidential and public consideration of issues relating to education;

(8) the importance of education is increasing as new technologies and alternative approaches to traditional education are considered, as society becomes more complex, and as equal opportunities in education and employment are promoted; and

(9) therefore, it is in the public interest and general welfare of the United States to establish a Department of Education.

PURPOSES

Sec. 102. (a) It is the purpose of this Act to establish a Department of Education in order to—

(1) insure that education receives the appropriate emphasis at the Federal level;

(2) enable the Federal Government to coordinate education activities and programs more effectively through interagency cooperation, technical assistance, and evaluation of program effectiveness;

(3) continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities;

(4) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents, and students to improve the quality of education, while acknowledging the right of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions to formulate policies, choose curricula, decide administrative questions, and choose program content with respect to their educational programs;

(5) encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the decisionmaking process relating to education, including the development and improvement of education programs and services;

(6) promote the quality and relevance of education to individual needs, including the assurance of an adequate level of skill development and lifelong learning opportunities;

(7) broaden approaches to meeting educational and developmental needs by strengthening relationships among schools, parents, students, communities, the workplace, and other related institutions;

(8)(A) provide assistance in the support of research relating to human development and learning systems that complement education, with a greater emphasis on the practical application of such research; (B) collect and analyze information on the progress and condition of education in the United States; and (C) work with State, local, and tribal officials, public and nonpublic educational institutions, community organizations, parents, and students to implement the findings of such research at the local level;

(9) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, tribal, and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated educational needs of such agencies, especially with respect to the simplification of the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, as well as the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens and constraints, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds; and

(10) assess the potential contribution of educational institutions, including institutions of higher education, to the improvement of education by creating mechanisms by which such institutions may bring problems to the attention of appropriate departments and agencies and may make recommendations to foster the continuing vitality of such institutions.

(b) It is the intention of the Congress in the creation of the Department of Education to protect the rights of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, and selection of curricula and program content, and to strengthen and improve the direction of such governments and institutions over their educational programs and policies.

TITLE II—ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

SEC. 201. There is established as an executive department of the Government, the Department of Education.

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS

SEC. 202. (a) The Department shall be administered by a Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level I of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5312 of title 5, United States Code.

(b)(1) There shall be in the Department an Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Under Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level III of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5314, United States Code.

(2) The Secretary shall designate the order in which other officials of the Department shall act for and perform the functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of both the Secretary and Under Secretary or in the event of vacancies in both of those offices.

(c)(1) There shall be in the Department—

(A) an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services;

(B) an Assistant Secretary for Indian Education;

(C) an Assistant Secretary for Child Nutrition;

(D) an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education;

(E) an Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education;

(F) an Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education;

(G) an Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement;

(H) a Director of the Office for Civil Rights;

(I) two additional Assistant Secretaries;

(J) an Inspector General; and

(K) a General Counsel.

(2) Each of the Assistant Secretaries, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the Inspector General, and the General Counsel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the Inspector General, and the General Counsel shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the Inspector General, and the General Counsel shall report directly to the Secretary and shall be compensated at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

(3) The Assistant Secretary for Indian Education shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among lists of candidates submitted by tribes or other organizations of Indians, Alaskan Natives, or Aleuts.

(d) One of the Assistant Secretaries appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1)(I) shall administer the functions of the Department under section 203(11) and shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe. One of the Assistant Secretaries appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1)(I) shall administer the functions of the Department under section

203(13) and shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

(e) There shall be in the Department an Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependent Children. The Administrator shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. INTERGOVERNMENTAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

SEC. 215. (a) There is established within the Department an advisory committee to be known as the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council shall provide assistance and make recommendations to the Secretary and the President concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education.

(b)(1) In carrying out its functions under subsection (a), the Council shall—

(A) provide a forum for the development of intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education;

(B) make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs and education-related programs;

(C) promote better intergovernmental relations;

(D) assess Federal policies and make recommendations to insure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions;

(E) submit a report biannually to the Congress, to the President, and to the Secretary which—

(i) reviews the impact of Federal education policies upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions; and

(ii) assesses the achievement of Federal objectives in education as well as any adverse consequences of Federal actions upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions; and

(F) assist the Secretary in conducting conferences and similar activities to assess the contribution of each level of government to the delivery of equitable, high-quality, and effective education.

(2) In carrying out its function under subsection (a), the Council may review rules or regulations proposed by the Department concerning Federal education programs prior to the promulgation of such rules or regulations in order to determine the impact of such rules or regulations on State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

(c)(1) The Council shall be composed of twenty-two members, to be appointed by the President—

(A) six members from among representatives of elected State, local, and tribal officials;

(B) six members from among representatives of the public, including parents, students, and public interest groups;

(C) five members from among representatives of public and nonpublic preschool, elementary, and secondary educational institutions, including school board members, administrators, and teachers; and

(D) five members from among representatives of public and nonpublic postsecondary educational institutions, including board members, administrators, and teachers.

(2) In making appointments under this subsection, the President shall consult with various organizations representative of the groups specified in subparagraphs (A) through (D) of paragraph (1), including the National Governors' Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, and the United States Conference of Mayors.

(3) Not more than eleven of the members of the Council may be members of the same political party.

(d)(1) Members of the Council shall be appointed for a term of four years, except that the term of office of the members first appointed shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, five at the end of one year, five at the end of two years, six at the end of three years, and six at the end of four years.

(2) Any member of the Council who is appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1) may serve on the Council beyond the period that such member holds the elective office which served as the basis of the appointment of such member.

(e) The President shall designate one of the members of the Council as the Chair of the Council.

(f) Twelve members of the Council shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may hold hearings. Any vacancy in the Council shall not affect its power to function.

(g)(1) In carrying out the provisions of subsection (b)(2), the Council shall establish a subcommittee to review proposed rules or regulations concerning Federal education programs in order to determine the impact of such rules or regulations on State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions. In reviewing such rules or regulations, the Council may provide parties to be affected by such rules or regulations an opportunity to comment on such rules or regulations, and shall consider any comments received in reviewing such rules or regulations.

(2) The Council may submit a report containing the results of its review of any such rules or regulations to the Secretary. Any such report shall be submitted by the Council within the time established for public comment on such rules or regulations. The Secretary shall place any report received from the Council on the record of the proceedings concerning such rules or regulations, and shall make such report public. Within thirty days of the receipt of such report, the Secretary shall submit a written public response on the record which addresses the recommendations made by the Council concerning any rule or regulation reviewed, and contains a statement of the reasons why the Secretary will or will not incorporate the recommendations made by the Council in such rule or regulation.

(h) Each member of the Council who is not otherwise employed by the United States Government shall receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily rate prescribed for GS–18 under the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime, for each day such member is engaged in the actual performance of duties as a member of the Council. A member of the Council who is an officer or employee of the United States Government shall serve without additional compensation. All members of the Council shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties.

(i) In order to carry out the provisions of this section, the Council is authorized to—

(1) hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, either as a whole or by subcommittee, and request the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as the Council or such subcommittee may deem advisable; and

(2) request the cooperation and assistance of Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities in carrying out the provisions of this section, and such departments, agencies, and instrumentalities are authorized to provide such cooperation and assistance.

(j) The Secretary shall appoint an executive director for the Council. Such executive director shall be compensated at the rate provided for GS–17 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332, title 5, United States Code. The Secretary shall provide the Council with such other staff, support, facilities, and assistance as may be necessary to enable the Council to carry out its duties under this section.

FEDERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

SEC. 216. (a) There is established a Federal Interagency Committee on Education. The Committee shall assist the Secretary in providing a mechanism to assure that the procedures and actions of the Department and other Federal departments and agencies are fully coordinated.

(b) The Committee shall cooperate with the Secretary in the conduct of studies and shall make recommendations in order to assure the effective coordination of Federal programs affecting education, including—

(1) the consistent administration of policies and practices by Federal agencies in the conduct of similar programs;

(2) full and effective communication among Federal agencies to avoid unnecessary duplication of activities;

(3) adequate procedures to assure the availability of information requested by the Secretary;

(4) the improvement, development, and oversight of a comprehensive Federal policy for education; and

(5) the improvement of the administration and coordination of federally funded vocational education and training programs for the purpose of aiding students and adults in preparing for and achieving success in their work life.

(c) (1) The Committee shall be composed of at least seventeen members. One member shall be the Secretary, who shall be the Chair of the Committee.

(2) (A) Sixteen members of the Committee shall be representatives of the departments and agencies listed in subparagraph (B), to be appointed by the head of each department and agency from among the senior officials of that department or agency who are responsible for the formulation of policy in that department or agency.

(B) The departments and agencies to be represented on the Committee pursuant to subparagraph (A) are—

(i) Department of Agriculture;
(ii) Department of Commerce;
(iii) Department of Defense;
(iv) Department of Energy;
(v) Department of Justice;
(vi) Department of Health and Welfare;
(vii) Department of the Interior;
(viii) Department of Labor;
(ix) Department of State;
(x) National Aeronautics and Space Administration;
(xi) National Endowment for the Arts;
(xii) National Endowment for the Humanities;
(xiii) National Science Foundation;
(xiv) Veterans' Administration;
(xv) Commission on Civil Rights; and
(xvi) Environmental Protection Agency.

(3) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, and the Executive Director of the Domestic Policy Staff may each designate a member of the staff of such agencies to attend meetings of the Committee as observers.

(4) The Secretary may invite the heads of Federal agencies other than the agencies represented on the Committee under the provisions of paragraph (2) to designate representatives to serve as members of the Committee or to participate in meetings of the Committee concerning matters of substantial interest to such agencies.

(d) In carrying out its functions under subsection (b) (5), the Committee shall conduct a study concerning the need for improved coordination between all federally funded vocational education and training programs. The Committee shall report the findings of such study to the Secretary and the Congress within two years of the date of enactment of this Act.

(e) The Committee shall meet at least twice each year.

(f) The Secretary and the head of each Federal agency represented on the Committee under subsection (c)(2) shall furnish such assistance, support, facilities, and staff to the Committee as may be necessary to enable the Committee to carry out its functions under this section.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

PART A—PERSONNEL PROVISIONS

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

SEC. 401. (a) The Secretary is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, including attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Secretary and the Department. Except as otherwise provided by law, such officers and employees shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and compensated in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title.

(b)(1) Subject to the provisions of chapter 51 of title 5, United States Code, but notwithstanding the last two sentences of section 5108(a) of such title, the Secretary may place in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18 all positions in such grades assigned and employed on August 1, 1978, in connection with functions transferred under this Act, subject to the limitation of the first sentence of section 5108(a) of such title.

(2) Appointments under this subsection may be made without regard to the provisions of section 3324 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the approval by the Civil Service Commission of appointments in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18, if the individual placed in such position is transferred to the Department in connection with a transfer of functions under this Act and, immediately before the effective date of this Act, held a position involving duties comparable to those of such position.

(3) The authority of the Secretary under this subsection to appoint personnel without regard to sections 3324 and 5108(a) of title 5, United States Code, shall cease with respect to any position when the person first appointed to fill such position no longer holds such position.

(c)(1) In addition to the number of positions which may be placed at the GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18 levels under section 5108 of title 5, United States Code, under existing law, or under this Act, the Secretary may appoint—

(A) for the Office of Education Research and Improvement, professional and technical employees, in a number not to exceed one-third of the total number of employees of such office; and without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and may fix the compensation of such personnel without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter 53 of such title, except the Secretary may not compensate any such personnel in excess of the maximum rate prescribed for GS–18 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code.

(B) not more than fifteen transitional employees;

(2) The authority of the Secretary to appoint and compensate personnel under paragraph (1)(B) shall expire three years after the effective date of this Act.

(d)(1) There are authorized for the Department seventy-one additional positions in the competitive service at levels GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18. Such positions shall be for the exclusive use of the Department and shall be in addition to the number of such positions placed in the appropriate grades under section 5108 of title 5, United States Code, or under other provisions of law.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to assign twenty-one of the positions authorized under this subsection to replace, at their former General Schedule levels, the twenty-one positions previously established by law in the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, except that the Secretary may from time to time evaluate the propriety of the General Schedule level of each such position and make any necessary reductions in such grade level.

(3) For purposes of determining the maximum aggregate number of positions which may be placed at grade levels GS–16, GS–17, or GS–18 under section 5108(a) of title 5, United States Code, of the positions established under this subsection, other than those used to replace positions previously established by law in the Education Division, 63 percent shall be deemed GS–16 positions, 25 percent shall be deemed GS–17 positions, and 12 percent shall be deemed GS–18 positions.

(e)(1) The functions which are administered by the Office of Indian Education established under section 211 and to which section 12 of the Act of June 18, 1934 (25 U.S.C. 472), or other Indian preference laws in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act are applicable and shall continue to be subject to such laws.

(2) Individuals who (A) are, on the day before the effective date of this Act, performing functions subject to section 12 of the Act of June 18, 1934 (25 U.S.C. 472) or other Indian preference laws in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act, and (B) are transferred to a part of the Department other than the Office of Indian Education established by section 211, shall continue to be subject to such laws for the duration of their service in the Department.

(f)(1) The Secretary is authorized to accept voluntary and uncompensated services without regard to the provisions of section 3679(b) of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 665(b)) provided that such services will not be used to displace Federal employees employed on a full-time, part-time, or seasonal basis.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to provide for incidental expenses, including but not limited to transportation, lodging, and subsistence for such volunteers.

(3) An individual who provides voluntary services under subsection (a) of this section shall not be considered a Federal employee for any purpose other than for purposes of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, relating to compensation for work injuries, and of chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code, relating to tort claims.

EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS

Sec. 402. The Secretary may obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, and may compensate such experts and consultants at rates not to exceed the daily rate prescribed for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title.

PART B—GENERAL PROVISIONS

AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 411. In the exercise of the functions transferred under this Act, the Secretary shall have the same authority as the functions of the agency or office, or any part thereof, exercising such functions immediately preceding their transfer, and the actions of the Secretary in exercising such functions shall have the same force and effect as when exercised by such agency or office, or part thereof.

DELEGATION

SEC. 412. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the Secretary may delegate any of his functions to such officers and employees of the Department as the Secretary may designate, and may authorize such successive redelegations of such functions within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate. No delegation of functions by the Secretary under this section or under any other provision of this Act shall relieve the Secretary of responsibility for the administration of such functions.

REORGANIZATION

SEC. 413. (a) Subject to the provisions of section 202(g) of this Act and subsection (b) of this section, the Secretary is authorized to allocate or reallocate functions among the officers of the Department, and to establish, consolidate, alter, or discontinue such organizational entities within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate. The authority of the Secretary under this subsection does not extend to—

(1) any office, bureau, unit, or other entity within the Department established by statute or any function vested by statute in such an entity or officer of such an entity;

(2) the abolition of organizational entities established by this Act; or

(3) the alteration of the delegation of functions under this Act to any specific organizational entity.

(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Secretary may not consolidate, alter, or discontinue any of the following statutory entities, or reallocate any functions vested by statute in the following statutory entities:

(A) Office of Bilingual Education;
(B) Teacher Corps;
(C) Community College Unit;
(D) National Center for Education Statistics;
(E) Office of Career Education;
(F) National Institute of Education;
(G) Office of Environmental Education;
(H) Office of Consumers' Education;
(I) Office of Libraries and Learning Resources;

(J) Institute of Museum Services; and

(K) Administrative units for guidance and counseling programs, the veterans' cost of instruction program, and the program for the gifted and talented children.

(2) The Secretary may not alter, consolidate, or discontinue any organizational entity continued within the Department and described in paragraph (1) of this subsection or reallocate any function vested by statute in such an entity, unless a period of ninety days has passed after the receipt by the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsection and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of such proposed action.

(c) On the effective date of this Act, the following entities shall lapse:

(1) The Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the Office of Education;

(2) The Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(3) The Office of Indian Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(4) The Bureau for the education and training for the handicapped of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; and

(5) The Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

REPORTING RELATIONSHIPS

SEC. 414. (a) Consistent with the provisions of section 413, and notwithstanding the provisions of the General Education Provisions Act or of any other Act, any officer or employee of the Department whose functions were transferred by this Act and who was required prior to the effective date of this Act to report to the Commissioner of Education or the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare shall report to the Secretary.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to delegate the reporting requirements established by subsection (a) to any other officer or employee of the Department.

RULES

SEC. 415. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe, in accordance with the provisions of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code, such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the functions of the Secretary or the Department.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 416. (a) The Secretary is authorized to enter into and perform such contracts, grants, leases, cooperative agreements, or other similar transactions with Federal departments and agencies, public agencies, State, local, and tribal governments, private organizations, and individuals, and to make such payments, by way of advance or reimbursement, as the Secretary may deem necessary or appropriate to carry out the functions of the Secretary in administering the Department.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no authority to enter into contracts or to make payments under this title shall be effective except to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance under appropriation Acts. This subsection shall not apply with respect to the authority granted under section 423.

TECHNICAL ADVICE

SEC. 417. The Secretary is authorized to provide advice, counsel, and technical assistance to applicants, potential applicants, and other interested persons with respect to any program or function of the Secretary or the Department. The Secretary shall, upon request, provide technical assistance to any State desiring to develop comprehensive plans applicable to two or more programs administered by the Department.

REGIONAL AND FIELD OFFICES

SEC. 418. The Secretary is authorized to establish, maintain, alter, or discontinue such regional or other field offices as may be necessary or appropriate to perform the functions of the Secretary or the Department.

ACQUISITION AND MAINTENANCE OF PROPERTY

SEC. 419. (a) The Secretary is authorized to—

(1) acquire (by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise), construct, improve, repair, operate, and maintain schools and related facilities, laboratories, research and testing sites and facilities, quarters and related accommodations for employees and dependents of employees of the Department, personal property (including patents), or any interest therein, as may be necessary; and

(2) provide by contract or otherwise for the establishment of eating facilities and other necessary facilities for the health and welfare of employees of the Department at its installations, and purchase and maintain equipment therefor.

(b) The authority available to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under section 524 of the Education Amendments of 1976 shall also be available to the Secretary.

(c) The authority granted by subsection (a) shall be available only with respect to facilities of a special purpose nature that cannot readily be reassigned for similar Federal activities and are not otherwise available for assignment to the Department by the Administrator of General Services.

FACILITIES AT REMOTE LOCATIONS

SEC. 420. (a) The Secretary is authorized to provide, construct, or maintain for employees and their dependents stationed at remote locations as necessary and when not otherwise available at such remote locations—

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) dining facilities;

(4) audiovisual equipment, accessories, and supplies for recreation and training;

(5) reimbursement for food, clothing, medicine, and other supplies furnished by such employees in emergencies for the temporary relief of distressed persons;

(6) living and working quarters and facilities; and

(7) transportation for dependents of employees of the Department to the nearest appropriate educational facilities.

(b) The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of the cost of such work or services or to refund excess sums when necessary.

USE OF FACILITIES

SEC. 421. (a) (1) To carry out the functions of the Secretary, the Secretary may use the research, equipment, services, and facilities of any agency or instrumentality of the United States or of any State, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any Indian tribe or tribal organization, or of any foreign government, with the consent of and with or without reimbursement to such agency, instrumentality, State, political subdivision, Indian tribe or tribal organization, or foreign government.

(2) Notwithstanding the transfer of functions from the Department of Defense to the Department under section 304, all personnel performing such functions shall be treated, for the purpose of access to services and facilities provided by the Department of Defense, as employees of the Department of Defense.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to permit public and private agencies, corporations, associations, Indian tribes or tribal organizations, other organizations, or individuals to use any real property, or any facilities, structures, or other improvement thereon, under the custody and control of the Secretary for Department purposes. The Secretary shall permit the use of such property, facilities, structures, or improvements under such terms and rates and for such periods as may be in the public interest, except that the periods of such uses may not exceed five years. The Secretary may require permittees under this section to recondition and maintain, at their own expense, the real property, facilities, structures, and improvements used by such permittees to a standard satisfactory to the Secretary. This subsection shall not apply to excess property as defined in section 3(e) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 472(e)).

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of such cost of the equipment or facilities provided or to refund excess sums when necessary.

COPYRIGHTS AND PATENTS

SEC. 422. The Secretary is authorized to acquire any of the following described rights if the property acquired thereby is for use by or for, or useful to, the Department:

(1) copyrights, patents, and applications for patents, designs, processes, and manufacturing data;

(2) licenses under copyrights, patents, and applications for patents; and

(3) releases, before suit is brought, for past infringement of patents or copyrights.

GIFTS AND BEQUESTS

SEC. 423. The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts, bequests, and devises of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts, bequests, and devises of money and proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts, bequests, or devises shall be deposited in the Treasury in a separate fund and shall be disbursed upon the order of the Secretary. Property accepted pursuant to this section, and the proceeds thereof, shall be used as nearly as possible in accordance with the terms of the gift, bequest, or devise donating such property. For the purposes of Federal income, estate, and gift taxes, property accepted under this section shall be considered as a gift, bequest, or devise to the United States.

WORKING CAPITAL FUND

SEC. 424. The Secretary is authorized to establish a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interests of economy and efficiency, including such services as a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its components; central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services; office space, central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and a central library service. The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing capital (which appropriations are hereby authorized) and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less the related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such funds shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of components of the Department, or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates which will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payment for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus found in the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses considered) above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund. There shall be transferred to the fund the stocks of supplies, equipment, other assets, liabilities, and unpaid obligations relating to the services which the Secretary determines will be performed through the fund.

FUNDS TRANSFER

SEC. 425. The Secretary may, when authorized in an appropriation Act in any fiscal year, transfer funds from one appropriation to another within the Department, except that no appropriation for any fiscal year shall be either increased or decreased pursuant to this section by more than 5 per centum and no such transfer shall result in increasing any such appropriation above the amount authorized to be appropriated therefor.

SEAL OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 426. The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department of such design as the Secretary shall approve. Judicial notice shall be taken of such seal.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 427. (a) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year, prepare and transmit a report to the President for transmission to the Congress concerning the activities of the Department during that fiscal year. Such report shall—

(1) include a statement of the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department which are consistent with the purposes of the Department as specified in section 102 and the findings of this Act as specified in section 101;

(2) contain an assessment of the progress made during that fiscal year and anticipated future progress toward the attainment of—

(A) the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department specified pursuant to paragraph (1);

(B) the effective and efficient management of the Department; and

(C) the coordination of the functions of the Department;

(3) contain and analyze objective data concerning—

(A) changing trends in education, as measured by indicators such as enrollments, expenditures, and numbers of teachers and other categories of professional and related personnel;

(B) areas of critical concern such as education of the disadvantaged and education in rural and urban areas; and

(C) the performance of the American educational system, as measured by such indicators as the overall results of student testing on generally recognized standard examinations for entrance to secondary and postsecondary institutions;

(4) include budget projections for the five fiscal years succeeding the fiscal year for which the report is made which are based on actual or anticipated appropriations for the fiscal year for which the report is made; and

(5) contain a separate section on the recommendations made by the Federal Interagency Committee on Education regarding the improvement of the coordination and development of Federal education programs.

(b)(1) In preparing and developing the report required by subsection (a), the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consult with members of the public, including representatives of parents, students, educators, Indian tribes, State and local governments, and other organizations and individuals. Within ninety days after the transmission of such report to the Congress, the Secretary shall hold public hearings in the District of Columbia and in such other locations as the Secretary deems appropriate to maximize public participation.

(2) The Secretary may reimburse any person for expenses reasonably incurred in the course of consultation or hearings under paragraph (1) if such person—

(A) has made or is likely to make a material contribution to the work of the Department; and

(B) could not otherwise participate fully and effectively in such consultation.

(3) For purposes of this section, the term "person" shall have the same meaning as in section 551(2) of title 5, United States Code.

RELATIONSHIP TO GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS ACT

SEC. 428. Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the General Education Provisions Act shall apply to functions transferred by this Act to the extent applicable immediately prior to the effective date of this Act.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 429. Subject to any limitation on appropriations applicable with respect to any function transferred to the Secretary, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and to enable the Secretary to administer and manage the Department. Funds appropriated in accordance with this section shall remain available until expended.

TITLE V—TRANSITIONAL, SAVINGS, AND CONFORMING PROVISIONS

TRANSFER AND ALLOCATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS AND PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the personnel employed in connection with, and the assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available to or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, subject to section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, are hereby transferred to the Secretary for appropriate allocation. Unexpended funds transferred pursuant to this subsection shall be used only for the purposes for which the funds were originally authorized and appropriated.

(b) Positions expressly specified by statute or reorganization plan to carry out functions transferred by this Act, personnel occupying those positions on the effective date of this Act, and personnel authorized to receive compensation in such positions at the rate prescribed for offices and positions at level I, II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5312 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, on the effective date of this Act, shall be subject to the provisions of section 503.

SEC. 502. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the transfer pursuant to this title of full-time personnel (except special Government employees) and part-time personnel holding permanent positions shall not cause any such employee to be separated or reduced in grade or compensation for one year after such transfer or after the effective date of this Act, whichever is later.

(b) Any person who, on the day before the effective date of this Act, held a position compensated in accordance with the Executive Schedule prescribed in chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, and who, without a break in service, is appointed in the Department to a position having duties comparable to the duties performed immediately preceding such appointment shall continue to be compensated in such new position at not less than the rate provided for such previous position for the duration of the service of such person in such new position.

AGENCY TERMINATIONS

SEC. 503. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, whenever all of the functions of any agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, have been terminated or transferred by this Act from such agency, commission, or other body, or component thereof, such agency, commission, or other body, or component, shall terminate. If an agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, terminates pursuant to the provisions of the preceding sentence, each position and office therein which was expressly authorized by law, or the incumbent of which was authorized to receive compensation at the rates prescribed for an office or position at level II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5313 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, shall terminate.

INCIDENTAL TRANSFERS

SEC. 504. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, at such time or times as such Director shall provide, is authorized and directed to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the transfer of functions which relate to or are utilized by an officer, agency, commission or other body or component thereof, affected by this Act, and to make such additional incidental dispositions of personnel, assets, liabilities, grants, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for the termination of the affairs of all agencies, commissions, offices, and other bodies terminated by this Act and for such further measures and dispositions as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 505. (a) All orders, determinations, rules regulations, permits, grants, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges—

(1) which have been issued, made, granted, or allowed to become effective by the President, any Federal department or agency or official thereof, or by a court of competent jurisdiction, in the performance of functions which are transferred under this Act to the Department or the Secretary, and shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or revoked in accordance with the law by the President, the Secretary, or other authorized official, a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(b)(1) The provisions of this Act shall not effect any proceedings, including notices of proposed rulemaking, or any application for any license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance pending on the effective date of this Act before any department, agency, commission, or component thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings and applications, to the extent that they relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued. Orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or revoked by the Secretary, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to prohibit the discontinuance or modification of any such proceeding under the same terms and conditions and to the same extent that such proceeding could have been discontinued or modified if this Act had not been enacted.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (e)—

(1) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the effective date of this Act, and

(2) in all such suits, proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

(d) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in the official capacity of such individual as an officer or any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act.

(e) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any department or agency, or officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer, is a party to a suit, and under this Act any function of such department, agency, or officer is transferred to the Secretary or any other official, then such suit shall be continued with the appropriate official of the Department substituted or added as a party.

(f) Orders and actions of the Secretary in the exercise of functions transferred under this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions had been by the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions, immediately preceding their transfer. Any statutory requirements relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Secretary.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 506. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remainder of this Act nor the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall be affected thereby.

REFERENCE

SEC. 507. With respect to any functions transferred by this Act and exercised after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any department, commission, or agency or to any officer or office the functions of which are so transferred shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary or Department.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 508. (a) Section 19(d)(1) of title 3, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately before the period a comma and the following: "Secretary of Education".

(b) Section 101 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

(1) by inserting "of Health and Welfare, the Secretary of Education," after "Secretary"; and

(2) by striking out "the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Department of Health and Welfare, the Department of Education,".

AMENDMENT TO THE COMPREHENSIVE EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ACT

SEC. 509. Section 306 of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 is amended to read as follows:

"CONSULTATION WITH THE SECRETARIES OF EDUCATION AND OF HEALTH AND WELFARE

"SEC. 306. The Secretary of Labor shall consult with the Secretary of Health and Welfare with respect to arrangements for services of a health or welfare character under this Act. The Secretary of Labor shall consult with the Secretary of Education with respect to arrangements for services of an educational nature under this Act, and the Secretary of Education shall solicit the advice and comments of State educational agencies with respect to education services. Such education services include but are not limited to basic or general education; educational programs conducted for offenders; institutional training; health care, child care, and other supportive services; and new careers and job restructuring in the health, education, and welfare professions. When the Secretary of Labor arranges for the provision of basic education and vocational training directly, pursuant to the provisions of this title, the Secretary of Labor shall obtain the approval of the Secretary of Education for such arrangements.".

CONTRACTS WITH INDIAN TRIBAL ORGANIZATIONS

Sec. 510 (a). The Indian Self-Determination and Educational Assistance Act is amended by inserting after section 102 the following new section:

"CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF EDUCATION

"SEC. 102A. (a)(1) The Secretary of Education is directed, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to enter into a contract or contracts with any tribal organization of such Indian tribe to carry out any or all of the functions, authorities, and responsibilities transferred to the Secretary of Education from the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of the Interior under the Department of Education Organization Act, except that the Secretary of Education may decline to enter into any contract requested by an Indian tribe if he finds in accordance with the procedures required under paragraph (2), that—

"(A) the service to be rendered to the Indian beneficiaries of of the particular program or function to be contracted for will not be satisfactory;

"(B) adequate protection of trust resources will not be assured by such contract; or

"(C) the proposed project or function to be contracted for cannot be properly completed or maintained by the proposed contract.

"(2)(A) In making the findings required under paragraph (1), the Secretary of Education shall consider whether the tribe or tribal organization would be deficient in performance under the contract with respect to (i) equipment, (ii) bookkeeping and accounting procedures, (iii) substantive knowledge of the program to be contracted for, (iv) community support for the contract, (v) adequately trained personnel, or (vi) other necessary components of contract performance.

"(B) Whenever the Secretary of Education declines to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary of Education shall (i) state objections in writing to the tribe within sixty days of such declination; (ii) provide, to the extent practicable, assistance to the tribe or tribal organization to overcome such stated objections; and (iii) provide the tribe with a hearing, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Education shall promulgate, and the opportunity for appeal to the Secretary of Education on the objections raised to such declination.

"(3) The Secretary of Education is authorized to require any tribe requesting that the Secretary of Education enter into a contract pursuant to the provisions of this title to obtain adequate liability insurance. Each such policy of insurance shall contain a provision that the insurance carrier shall waive any right it may have to raise as a defense the sovereign immunity of the Indian tribe from suit, but that such waiver shall extend only to claims the amount and nature of which are within the coverage and limits of the policy and shall not authorize or empower such insurance carrier to waive or otherwise limit the sovereign immunity of the tribe outside or beyond the coverage and limits of the policy of insurance.".

(b) Section 103 of such Act is amended by striking out "Health, Education, and Welfare" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Health and Welfare".

(c) Section 104 of such Act is amended by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d) and by inserting immediately after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) The Secretary of Education may, in accordance with regulations adopted pursuant to section 107 of this Act, make grants to any Indian tribe or organization for—

"(1) the development, construction, operation, provision, or maintenance of adequate education facilities or services, including the training of personnel for such development, construction, operation, provision, or maintenance, from funds appropriated to the Department of Education for Indian education services or Indian education facilities; or

"(2) planning, training, evaluation, or other activities designed to improve the capacity of a tribal organization to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to section 102A of this Act.".

(e)(1) Section 107(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "Interior and of Health, Education, and Welfare" and inserting "Interior, of Health and Welfare, and of Education".

(2) Section 107(c) of such Act is amended by striking out "Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare" and inserting "Interior, the Secretary of Health and Welfare, and the Secretary of Education".

(f) Section 109 of such Act is amended by inserting "102A," after "102,".

(g) Section 5(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "Interior or the Secretary of Heath, Education, and Welfare," and inserting in lieu thereof "Interior, the Secretary of Health and Welfare, or the Secretary of Education".

(h)(1) Section 8 of the Act of August 5, 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2004b) is amended by inserting "102A," after "102,".

(2) The first sentence of section 6(a)(2) of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967 (50 U.S.C. App. 456) is amended by striking out "amended" and inserting "amended, or the Department of Education Organization Act".

AMENDMENT TO THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT OF 1965

SEC. 511. Section 103(c)(2)(B) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Secretary of Health and Welfare shall transmit the information required by this subparagraph to the Secretary of Education not later than February 1 of each year.".

REDESIGNATION

Sec. 512. (a) The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is hereby redesignated the Department of Health and Welfare, and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is hereby redesignated the Secretary of Health and Welfare.

(b) Any reference to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, or any other official of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in any law, rule, regulation, certificate, directive, instruction, or other official paper in force on the effective date of this Act shall be deemed to refer and apply to the Department of Health and Welfare, the Secretary of Health and Welfare, or the appropriate official of the Department of Health and Welfare, respectively, except to the extent such reference is to a function transferred to the Secretary under this Act.

TRANSITION

Sec. 513. With the consent of the appropriate department or agency head concerned, the Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of such officers, employees, and other personnel of the departments and agencies of the executive branch for such period of time as may reasonably be needed to facilitate the orderly transfer of functions under this Act.

TITLE VI—EFFECTIVE DATE AND INTERIM APPOINTMENTS

EFFECTIVE DATE

Sec. 601. (a) The provisions of this Act shall take effect one hundred eighty days after the Secretary first takes office, or on such earlier date as the President may prescribe and publish in the Federal Register, except that at any time after the date of enactment of this Act—

(1) any of the officers provided for in title II of this Act may be nominated and appointed as provided in such title, and

(2) the Secretary may promulgate regulations pursuant to section 505(b)(2) of this Act.

(b) Funds available to any department or agency (or any official or component thereof), the functions of which are transferred to the Secretary by this Act, may, with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, be used to pay the compensation and expenses of any officer appointed pursuant to this Act until such time as funds for that purpose are otherwise available.

INTERIM APPOINTMENTS

Sec. 602. (a) In the event that one or more officers required by this Act to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall not have entered upon office on the effective date of this Act and notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the President may designate and officer in the executive branch to act in such office for one hundred twenty days or until the office is filled as provided in this Act, whichever occurs first.

(b) Any officer acting in an office in the Department pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for such office under this Act.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

In compliance with subsection 4 of Rule XXIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, changes in existing law made by the bill, as reported, are shown as follows (existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets, new matter is printed in italic, and existing law in which no change is proposed shown in Roman):

TITLE I—INDIAN SELF-DETERMINATION ACT

Sec. 101. This title may be cited as the "Indian Self-Determination Act".

CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Sec. 102. * * *

CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF EDUCATION

Sec. 102A. (a)(1) The Secretary of Education is directed, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to enter into a contract or contracts with any tribal organization of such Indian tribe to carry out any or all of the functions, authorities, and responsibilities transferred to the Secretary of Education from the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of the Interior under the Department of Education Organization Act, except that the Secretary of Education may decline to enter into any contract requested by an Indian tribe if he finds in accordance with the procedures required under paragraph (2), that—

(A) the service to be rendered to the Indian beneficiaries of the particular program or function to be contracted for will not be satisfactory;

(B) adequate protection of trust resources will not be assured by such contract; or

(C) the proposed project or function to be contracted for cannot be properly complete or maintained by the proposed contract.

(2)(A) In making the findings required under paragraph (1), the Secretary of Education shall consider whether the tribe or tribal organization would be deficient in performance under the contract with respect to (i) equipment, (ii) bookkeeping and accounting procedures, (iii) substantive knowledge of the program to be contracted for, (iv) community support for the contract, (v) adequately trained personnel, or (vi) other necessary components of contract performance.

(B) Whenever the Secretary of Education declines to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary of Education shall (i) state objections in writing to the tribe within sixty days of such declination; (ii) provide, to the extent practicable, assistance to the tribe or tribal organization to overcome such stated objections; and (iii) provide the tribe with a hearing, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Education shall promulgate, and the opportunity for appeal to the Secretary of Education on the objections raised to such declination.

"(3) The Secretary of Education is authorized to require any tribe requesting that the Secretary of Education enter into a contract pursuant to the provisions of this title to obtain adequate liability insurance. Each such policy of insurance shall contain a provision that the insurance carrier shall waive any right it may have to raise as a defense the sovereign immunity of the Indian tribe from suit, but that such waiver shall extend only to claims the amount and nature of which are within the coverage and limits of the policy and shall not authorize or empower such insurance carrier to waive or otherwise limit the sovereign immunity of the tribe outside or beyond the coverage and limits of the policy of insurance.".

CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF HEALTH [, EDUCATION,] AND WELFARE

SEC. 103. (a) The Secretary of Health [, Education,] and Welfare is directed, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to enter into a contract or contracts with any tribal organization of any such Indian tribe to carry out any or all of his functions, authorities, and responsibilities under the Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended: Provided, however, That the Secretary may initially decline to enter into any contract requested by an Indian tribe if he finds that: (1) the service to be rendered to the Indian beneficiaries of the particular program or function to be contracted for will not be satisfactory; (2) adequate protection of trust resources is not assured; or (3) the proposed project or function to be contracted for cannot be properly completed or maintained by the proposed contract: Provided further, That the Secretary of Health [, Education,] and Welfare, in arriving at his finding, shall consider whether the tribe or tribal organization would be deficient in performance under the contract with respect to (A) equipment, (B) bookkeeping and accounting procedures, (C) substantive knowledge of the program to be contracted for, (D) community support for the contract, (E) adequately trained personnel, or (F) other necessary components of contract performance.

(b) Whenever the Secretary of Health [, Education,] and Welfare declines to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, he shall (1) state his objections in writing to the tribe within sixty days; (2) provide, to the extent practicable, assistance to the tribe or tribal organization to overcome his stated objections; and (3) provide the tribe with a hearing, under such rules and regulations as he shall promulgate, and the opportunity for appeal on the objections raised.

(c) The Secretary of Health [, Education] and Welfare is authorized to require any tribe requesting that he enter into a contract pursuant to the provisions of this title to obtain adequate liability insurance: Provided, however, That each such policy of insurance shall contain a provision that the insurance carrier shall waive any right it may have to raise as a defense the tribe's sovereign immunity from suit, but that such waiver shall extend only to claims the amount and nature of which are within the coverage and limits of the policy and shall not authorize or empower such insurance carrier to waive or otherwise limit the tribe's sovereign immunity outside or beyond the coverage and limits of the policy of insurance.

(c) The Secretary of Education may, in accordance with regulations adopted pursuant to section 107 of this Act, make grants to any Indian tribe or organization for—

(1) the development, construction, operation, provision, or maintenance of adequate education facilities or services, including the training of personnel for such development, construction, operation, provision, or maintenance, from funds appropriated to the Department of Education for Indian education services or Indian education facilities; or

(2) planning, training, evaluation, or other activities designed to improve the capacity of a tribal organization to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to section 102A of this Act.

(c) The provisions of any other Act notwithstanding, any funds made available to a tribal organization under grants pursuant to this section may be used as matching shares for any other Federal grant programs which contribute to the purposes for which grants under this section are made.

(b) The Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended, is further amended by adding a new section 8 after section 7 of the Act, as follows:

"SEC. 8. In accordance with subsection (d) of section 214 of the Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 690), as amended, upon the request of any Indian tribe, band, group, or community, commissioned officers of the Service may be assigned by the Secretary for the purpose of assisting such Indian tribe, group, band, or community in carrying out the provisions of contracts with, or grants to, tribal organizations pursuant to section 102, 102A, 103, or 104 of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act".

SEC. 106. (a) Contracts with tribal organizations pursuant to sections [102] 102, 102A, and 103 of this Act shall be in accordance with all Federal contracting laws and regulations except that, in the discretion of the appropriate Secretary, such contracts may be negotiated without advertising and need not conform with the provisions of the Act of August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 793), as amended: Provided, That the appropriate Secretary may waive any provisions of such contracting laws or regulations which he determines are not appropriate for the purposes of the contract involved or inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

(b) Payments of any grants or under any contracts pursuant to section 102, 102A, 103, or 104 of this Act may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement and in such installments and on such conditions as the appropriate Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this title. The transfer of funds shall be scheduled consistent with program requirements and applicable Treasury regulations, so as to minimize the time elapsing between the transfer of such funds from the United States Treasury and the disbursement thereof by the tribal organization, whether such disbursement occurs prior to or subsequent to such transfer of funds. Tribal organizations shall not be held accountable for interest earned on such funds, pending their disbursement by such organization.

(c) Any contract requested by a tribe pursuant to sections [102] 102, 102A, 103 of this Act shall be for a term not to exceed one year unless the appropriate Secretary determines that a longer term would be advisable: Provided, That such term may not exceed three years and shall be subject to the availability of appropriations: Provided, further, That the amounts of such contracts may be renegotiated annually to reflect factors, including but not limited to cost increases beyond the control of a tribal organization.

(d) Notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary, the appropriate Secretary may, at the request or consent of a tribal organization, revise or amend any contract or grant made by him pursuant to sections 102, 102A, 103, or 104 of this Act with such organization as necessary to carry out the purposes of this title: Provided, however, That whenever an Indian tribe requests retrocession of the appropriate Secretary for any contract entered into pursuant to this Act, such retrocession shall become effective upon a date specified by the appropriate Secretary not more than one hundred and twenty days from the date of the request by the tribe or at such later date as may be mutually agreed to by the appropriate Secretary and the tribe.

(e) In connection with a contract or grant made pursuant to section 102, 102A, 103, or 104 of this Act, the appropriate Secretary may permit a tribal organization to utilize, in carrying out such contract or grant, existing school buildings, hospitals, and other facilities and all equipment therein or appertaining thereto and other personal property owned by the Government within his jurisdiction under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon for their use and maintenance.

(f) The contracts authorized under sections [102] 102, 102A, and 103 of this Act and grants pursuant to section 104 of this Act may include provisions for the performance of personal services which would otherwise be performed by Federal employees including, but in no way limited to, functions such as determination of eligibility of applicants for assistance, benefits, or services, and the extent or amount of such assistance, benefits, or services, all in accordance with the terms of the contract or grant and applicable rules and regulations of the appropriate Secretary: Provided, That the Secretary shall not make any contract which would impair his ability to discharge his trust responsibilities to any Indian tribe or individuals.

(g) Contracts and grants wth tribal organizations pursuant to sections 102, 102A, 103, and 104 of this Act and the rules and regulations adopted by the Secretaries of the [Interior and Health, Education, and Welfare] Interior, Health and Welfare, and Education pursuant to section 107 of this Act shall include provisions to assure the fair and uniform provision by such tribal organizations of the services and assistance they provide to Indians under such contracts and grants.

(h) The amount of funds provided under the terms of contracts entered into pursuant to sections [102] 102, 102A, and 103 shall not be less than the appropriate Secretary would have otherwise provided for his direct operation of the programs or portions thereof for the period covered by the contract: Provided, That any savings in operation under such contracts shall be utilized to provide additional services or benefits under the contract.

PROMULGATION OF RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 107. (a) The Secretaries of the [Interior and of Health, Education, and Welfare] Interior, of Health and Welfare, and of Education are each authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this title.

* * * * * * *

(c) The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of [Health, Education, and Welfare] Health and Welfare, and the Secretary of Education are authorized to revise and amend any rules or regulations promulgated pursuant to this section: Provided, That prior to any revision or amendment to such rules or regulations, the respective Secretary or Secretaries shall present the proposed revision or amendment to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives and shall, to the extent practicable, consult with appropriate national or regional Indian organizations and shall publish any proposed revisions in the Federal Register not less than sixty days prior to the effective date of such rules and regulations in order to provide adequate notice to, and receive comments from, other interested parties.

REASSUMPTION OF PROGRAMS

SEC. 109. Each contract or grant agreement entered into pursuant to sections 102, 102A, 103, and 104 of this Act shall provide that in any case where the appropriate Secretary determines that the tribal organization's performance under such contract or grant agreement involves (1) the violation of the rights or endangerment of the health, safety, or welfare of any persons; or (2) gross negligence or mismanagement in the handling or use of funds provided to the tribal organization pursuant to such contract or grant agreement, such Secretary may, under regulations prescribed by him and after providing notice and hearing to such tribal organization, rescind such contract or grant agreement and assume or resume control or operation of the program, activity, or service involved if he determines that the tribal organization has not taken corrective action as prescribed by him: Provided, That, the appropriate Secretary may, upon notice to a tribal organization, immediately rescind a contract or grant and resume control or operation of a program, activity, or service if he finds that there is an immediate threat to safety and, in such cases, he shall hold a hearing on such action within ten days thereof. Such Secretary may decline to enter into a new contract or grant agreement and retain control of such program, activity, or service until such time as he is satisfied that the violations of rights or endangerment of health, safety, or welfare which necessitated the rescission has been corrected. Nothing in this section shall be construed as contravening the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (84 Stat. 1590), as amended (29 U.S.C. 651).

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MR. PERCY, MRS. HUMPHREY, AND MR. DANFORTH

We support the creation of a Department of Education. However, we oppose the transfer of the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) child nutrition programs into the new Department. A motion to delete the child nutrition programs from S. 991 was defeated in committee by tie vote (8 to 8). The amendment will again be offered on the floor of the Senate.

There are a number of sound reasons for keeping these programs in USDA. First, a Department of Education will be dominated by educators. Educators have had a history of obstructing the placement of these programs within the schools. In testimony received by the committee, the Food Research and Action Center, a nonprofit, antihunger advocacy center stated that:

> A good portion of our effort has been in the area of school lunch and school breakfast program expansion. Time after time we have found that State and local boards of education have been at best uninterested, and at worst obstructionists, in this expansion effort. FRAC and/or legal services attorneys have brought numerous lawsuits seeking to expand school lunch programs in local areas. These lawsuits, brought on behalf of low-income plaintiffs, resulted in the establishment of school lunch programs in Hartford, Conn.; Bridgeport, Conn.; Mount Vernon, N.Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; and the State of Rhode Island, among others. In many of these areas, litigation would not have been required if state and local boards of education and education administrators had viewed the school food programs as integral parts of an educational environment.
> In short, in the past, poor people have not been able to look to education administrators and policymakers to spearhead the need for school food programs. Instead, these administrators have often taken the position that such programs are expensive, administratively burdensome, and must take a distant back seat to other education priorities.

In addition to FRAC's testimony, The Children's Foundation testified that it is completing a study on barriers to the implementation of the school breakfast program. The study is entitled "I'd Rather Go to Hell Than Run a Breakfast Program." This was the direct quote of a local school official. It is indicative of the view that many such officials have of these programs.

Second, the transfer will jeopardize the funding of the child nutrition programs. Since educators have not generally viewed nutrition programs as a vital part of the educational process, it is reasonable to assume that a Federal Department of Education would be no more responsive to the importance of such programs. When faced with budgetary constraints, these programs will be seen as expendable. This would be particularly true of those child nutrition programs with little or no connection to school systems, such as the summer food and day care feeding programs.

Third, USDA would still keep the research support vital to these programs. USDA is increasing its research in both nutrition and agricultural economics. It would be counterproductive to remove the child nutrition programs from a Department that is presently equipped to do research in areas directly related to the improvement of these programs.

Fourth, although the administration has pledged its continued support for the commodities aspect of these programs, this guarantee may become worthless several years down the road as the programs become dominated by educators. Moreover, we must not lose sight of one of the original reasons behind the creation of the school lunch program, which was commodity support. Instead of paying farmers not to grow crops, we are paying them for their surplus crops and using those surplus crops to feed hungry children. This is a much more efficient use of taxpayers' money. As the entire Senate Committee on Agriculture brought to our attention:

> The school lunch program today constitutes the only effective means through which the Secretary of Agriculture can provide price and market stabilization to those farm commodities that do not enjoy the protection of Government price support programs.

Fifth, the transfer is opposed by a broad spectrum of groups, including agriculture groups, child-oriented public interest groups, nutritionists, and school food administrators. This grouping includes the American School Food Service Association, which is the largest national association representing people who direct, manage, and work in school nutrition programs at the State and local level. These groups have worked the closest with and are the most knowledgeable on the child nutrition programs.

Sixth, the President's reorganization project is presently conducting a study of the Federal nutrition effort. This study is not scheduled to be completed until next year. As a result, the transfer of these programs at this time would be premature.

Regarding nutrition education, we would again like to quote one of our witnesses, Mr. Hendrik Wentink of the Poultry and Egg Institute of America. He states:

> While nutrition education historically has nowhere received the emphasis it has deserved, it cannot be disputed that the USDA is exerting aggressive leadership in the area today. Secretary Bergland has formed a Human Nutrition Policy Committee to coordinate all USDA nutrition programs including food assistance, safety, quality research, and education. Interim regulations to implement nutrition education grants to the States under the 1977 Child Nutrition Act Amendments have been promulgated. The Department is conducting a novel nutrition awareness project which will test out a multimedia approach for issuing and reinforming nutrition messages. Authority under recent amendments of the National School Lunch Act to prohibit the sale of "junk food" in participating schools is being invoked. The focus of Extension activities is being expanded to reach urban areas more effectively. The very substantial expanded food and nutrition program within the Extension Service is developing a special program to emphasize nutrition counseling for food stamp users. And these are far from all the fronts of the USDA's nutrition education campaign.

It has been stated that the best place for nutrition education is in the schools. We agree. But we also ask, if educators are so interested in nutrition education, why have they not instituted these programs in the schools? The evidence indicates educators are not interested. In fact, they are so disinterested that they have actually promoted non-nutritious "junk foods" in the schools. In order to raise extra money, they have candy and soda machines in the schools. These junk food machines compete with the nutritious lunches served in the school cafeteria. Congress recognized this problem, a problem created by educators, last year when it mandated USDA to ban the sale of junk foods that compete with the school lunch program. USDA has responded to that mandate and that ban is going into effect this summer. How can we justify transferring these programs to a Department which will be dominated by such insensitive interests?

The question has been asked, "Where will these programs best operate and serve our Nation's children?" The answer is that they will best operate and serve our children in USDA. In recent years, we have to understand that it is vitally important that our food, nutrition, and agricultural policies be coordinated. As Senator Talmadge stated in a letter to the committee, cosigned by the entire Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry, USDA is the best place for achieving maximum coordination. In the letter, he states:

> GAO in a recent report on nutrition research, found "a lack of central focus and coordination" to be the No. 1 barrier to progress in the area. We feel certain that progress in evolving a food and agricultural policy is equally dependent on having a central focus. If the development of a national energy policy demanded a new Department of Energy to coordinate and pull together all aspects of the problem, then we insist that the same principle applies to the development of a national food, nutrition, and agriculture policy. The nutrition programs should not be sent to other agencies or departments; indeed the food-related functions of other departments should be consolidated within the Department of Agriculture.

As we have shown, educators have a marked disinterest in nutrition education and in the school feeding programs. On the other hand, USDA has demonstrated great interest and enthusiasm. Transfer of these programs would not solve any problems, it would create new ones. The child nutrition programs should and must remain in a broad-based Department of Agriculture.

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MR. STEVENS

While I support the general thrust of S. 991, to create a separate Department of Education, I am opposed to the inclusion of the Bureau of Indian Affairs schools and education programs.

Last May, I chaired a Government Affairs hearing, and the position of the American Indian community was made quite clear by the many Indian organizations that testified. The vast majority of Indians and Alaskan Natives are opposed to the removal of education programs from BIA which is responsible for matters affecting their interest. In Alaska, the largest Indian organization, the Alaska Federation of Natives, which represents all Alaskan Natives and Aleuts, opposed this transfer because they have not had enough time to discuss it with their members. They have informed me that the bill also does not adequately address trust responsibility or tribal sovereignty rights.

It is most unfortunate that the committee voted against the majority of the Indian communities wishes, during the same time period when representatives of the Indian nations were dramatically presenting their views to Congress and the administration. The enormous personal efforts made in the longest walk from California to the Nation's Capitol is symbolic of the traditional spirit ever present in the tribes. It seems to me that this Congress should be listening to these Native Americans instead of doing what they think is best for the Indian without proper consultation.

Early in 1976 are administration affirmed that issues affecting the American Indian would be resolved in the tribal council rooms and not in Washington, D.C.

It is distressing to me that this promise was broken. Because of overwhelming opposition in the Indian community, I offered an amendment in committee to delete the transfer of BIA schools and education programs. I will continue to oppose this transfer until the concerns of the Indian nations have been met.

Furthermore, I feel that the civil rights function of the Department of Education should contain an office responsible for addressing the bilingual education concerns of Indians. This office should be totally committed to the many unique problems of the Indian community and staffed accordingly. The problems Alaska has had in striving to meet the Supreme Court mandate in this area, demonstrate the need for a separate Indian division within the Office of Civil Rights.

Alaska has been embroiled in a battle with the Office for Civil Rights for 3 years. Last summer my State had been threatened with administrative hearings and a possible penalty of the loss of all Federal education funds. The State department of education has now reached a general consensus on a bilingual compliance plan. However, I feel if a Native American had been involved in the proceedings from the beginning there would have been more sympathy with the numerous dialects and rural conditions my State must overcome in order to comply with the 1974 Supreme Court decision.

TED STEVENS.

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MR. DANFORTH AND MR. ROTH

Our pluralistic, locally controlled system of education is one of this Nation's greatest assets. The establishment of a Cabinet-level Department of Education is not in any way intended or expected to result in expanded Federal involvement in education issues that are the primary responsibility of States and localities. Rather, the new Department is intended to strengthen the capacity of States, localities, and private institutions to meet their educational needs. The Secretary of Education must give high priority to simplifying Federal procedures and eliminating unnecessary requirements and constraints on the recipients of Federal education funds.

In establishing a Cabinet-level Department of Education, the temptation is going to be strong for the new Department to start flexing its muscles, to see itself as the source of all decisionmaking in education. That would be just exactly the wrong approach for it to take. It would be a real departure from what is very important to our tradition as a country, and that is that education is not run from Washington.

It should be made very clear that this bill does not serve as a mandate for the new Department to issue directives and regulations which impose its opinions on local school districts.

It is our intention that the Federal Government should be in the business of assisting and supporting local school districts and State governments as they address the problem of education. Federal education policy should supplement and complement, rather than direct or duplicate, State efforts to meet the Nation's education needs. The new Department of Education should not be in the business of preempting the decisionmaking process and aggregating to itself new powers to manipulate local decisions.

It should be noted that Federal sources provide less than 10 percent of States funding for elementary and secondary education. These funds consist primarily of programs such as ESEA, title I, and vocational education, where the States serve as administering agents for the Federal Government.

The new Department of Education should seek, as one of its primary and first efforts, to reduce the Federal paperwork burden. This burden stems primarily from the requirement that individual school districts report extensively on achievements expected, achievements actually experienced, and financial data associated with narrow categorical programs. California data suggests that the Federal requirements account for 60 percent of the local reporting burden and about 40 percent of the State reporting burden at the primary and secondary level.

The word "targeting" has been used in Washington. Targeting means that the Federal Government will direct its resources and its moneys at local and State governments in a manner calculated to have maximum impact on decisions which traditionally are made locally.

In practice, targeting has come to mean manipulation. With the Federal dollar, we can move State or local governments, manipulating them in the direction we think they should be going. This is a practice which ignores the traditional role of State and local governments, and which wrongly assumes that Federal agencies are better able to make wise decisions than local officials. In establishing a new Department of Education it is not our intention to advance this practice.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 95th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Vol. 124 WASHINGTON, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1978 No. 146

Senate

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 16, 1978)

S 15381

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Madam President, going to the fourth track, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 1058, which is the Budget Waiver Act with respect to the pending measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Madam President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate, in accordance with the agreement on the natural gas conference report and without prejudice to the Public Broadcasting bill, proceed to the be before the Senate no longer than until 3 o'clock p.m. today; and, of course, under the natural gas conference report agreement, anything must be set aside for that conference report if any Senator wishes the floor. After the vote on the motion to recommit today, and still in accordance with the natural gas conference report agreement, if no Senator seeks the floor with respect to the objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 532) waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 991, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 991. Such waiver is necessary because (1) S. 991 is an unusually complex bill which establishes a new Cabinet-level Department of Education and transfers to it the functions of the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, as well as certain functions of other agencies; and (2) the Administration did not indicate its position on this bill until the middle of April 1978, and did not present substantive comments relative to S. 991 until May 17, 1978. This late action on the part of the Administration made it impossible for the committee to consider and act on the bill by May 15, 1978.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

consideration of Calendar Order No. 1000, S. 991, the Department of Education Organization Act, with the understanding that there be no amendment on busing received today, and that the bill be before the Senate no longer than until 3 o'clock p.m. today, without any understanding as to when it shall be further called up except that the majority leader, after consultation with the minority leader, may be authorized to call it up at a future date.

Mr. STEVENS. Madam President, reserving the right to object, is my understanding correct that the intent would be to call it up after a vote on the energy bill; is that correct?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That it would not come up today at all.

Mr. STEVENS. No, the vote on a week from tomorrow.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Oh, I am sorry if I left that impression. The bill would conference report, the Senate would take up the Public Broadcasting Service bill under the order of yesterday, and I believe there is a time agreement on that; I know there is. Hopefully the Senate can dispose of that bill today.

What I am saying with respect to the Department of Education bill is that it would not come up again today, and it would be up to the majority leader, after consultation with the minority leader, to determine when it would again be called up for the resumption of consideration; and that there would be no busing amendment offered today.

Mr. STEVENS. Reserving the right to object, and again I shall not object, as I understand, this is still subject to concurrence as far as calling up the Department of Education bill again. There are some of us who have amendments; I specifically have an amendment, and I will be out of town on Friday. I know the Senator from Connecticut will be out of town on Thursday. I wanted to make sure that I would not be foreclosed on that amendment.

Mr. RIBICOFF. If the Senator will yield, I will be out of town until Tuesday, so the Senator from Alaska is fully protected.

Mr. STEVENS. I feel confident in that protection, and I do not object.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. For the further information of the Senator from Alaska, we are now operating on a triple track system, and can even go beyond that; so it is a multiple track system.

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I hope we can make at least some progress on that measure today.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I thank the majority leader and the acting minority leader for an opportunity to bring up this most important piece of legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 991) to establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

I wish to thank Senator PERCY, the ranking minority member of the Governmental Affairs Committee, and the other committee members for their support of this legislation.

We are indebted to American education for the vital role it plays in the development and success of this Nation. Democratic government depends on an informed and educated public. Education is important to the American people. This country was built on the basic belief that hard work, commonsense, and education are the keys to a successful and happy life. A recent Harris poll showed 90 percent of the public surveyed felt "achieving quality education for children" was very important. Another showed 75 percent of those surveyed believe a "free, unlimited education" is a major factor to our country's future success.

Today, more than 50 million people in the United States are directly involved with educ[illegible]n. Total education spending approa[illegible]e $180 billion level, nearly 10 per[illegible]of the gross national product. State and local governments spend more money on education than anything else—approximately 40 percent of their budgets.

Yet today education programs in the Federal Government are buried four and five levels deep within the massive Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. They are scattered among 40 Federal agencies. Their leadership is split between a Commissioner of Education and an Assistant Secretary for Education. They are smothered by the general education programs. Altogether, more than 170 programs would be incorporated in the new Department.

Creation of the new department will provide better opportunities for Congress and the President to focus more clearly on better management of education programs.

The head of the new department, the Secretary of Education, will be more accountable to Congress and the public for Federal education services.

A Secretary of Education will improve the administration of Federal education programs. A major problem in the Education Division of HEW now is that the structure and lines of authority are unclear and often confusion. Education responsibilities are fragmented within HEW between the Assistant Secretary for Education and the Commissioner of Education. Little in the way of responsibility is assigned to the Assistant Secretary. Most programs are under the purview of the Commissioner of Education—a position evidenced by frustration. In the last 12 years, the commissionership has changed hands 13 different times.

A Department of Education would allow education programs to be administered by a clearly ordered structure, where the lines of authority and responsibility are clearly defined. This would be a sound administrative and managerial move. The American Society for Public Administration, for the first time in its history, has endorsed the creation of a Cabinet department—the De-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the following staffers of the Committee on Governmental Affairs be permitted to remain on the Senate floor during the consideration and votes on S. 991, to establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes: Dick Wegman, Marilyn Harris, Bob Heffernan, and Jon Greenblatt; Charlottee Tsoucalas, Terry Jolly, Bob Harris, Cheryl Davis, Dru Smith, Tom Cator, John Childers, Lawrence Grisham, Brian Conboy, Link Hoewing, Nancy Anderson, Carl Flair, Mary Ann Simpson, Martina Pearson, and Jill Porter; and the following staffers from the Committee on Human Resources: Franklin Zweig, Jean Frohlicker, Marsha McCord, Greg Fusco, and Steve Paradise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Madam Presdent, for the first time in the history of this body, we are considering legislation to create a separate, Cabinet-level Department of Education.

In January of 1965, I introduced a bill to create a Department of Education. Now, some 13 years later, the full Senate is considering the concept.

More than 60 Senators—Democrats, Republicans, moderates, liberals, and conservatives—have sponsored this legislation. This is not, by any means, a partisan issue.

The Committee on Governmental Affairs gave very serious consideration to S. 991 and reported the bill unanimously. overwhelming and dominant concerns of health and welfare. Their coordination is almost nonexistent.

Although the Federal Government spends more than $25 billion on education for over 300 programs there is no visibility or accountability in the Federal Government. Education is not represented at the Cabinet table with other important concerns such as agriculture, labor, transportation, and housing. HEW's responsibilities are so vast and the HEW Secretary is spread so thinly that inevitably some programs suffer from lack of attention. Education is often the victim of neglect and poor interdepartmental competition with massive health and welfare programs. Out of HEW's $180 billion budget, at least $168 billion will be expended for health and welfare.

The creation of a Department of Education remedies institutional deficiencies presently existing within HEW. By removing education from HEW, we will achieve a number of benefits:

There will be one high-level Federal official who will speak for education in the Federal Government.

The administration of and attention given to all three components—education, health, and welfare—will improve as a result of the reorganization.

By separating education from the overwhelming influences of health and welfare, the Congress will be better able to clearly evaluate budget allotments for education.

The legislation goes far toward achieving a significant measure of consolidation of the widely scattered Department of Education. They state:

> The addition of another Cabinet Department would not unduly stretch the President's span of major organizational control. On the other hand, coordination of educational programs to minimize unnecessary administrative burdens and expense for educational institutions and to rationalize inconsistent educational policies would be facilitated if a Cabinet official were given this as a major assignment.

Coordination is necessary to reduce costs and redtape. The situation today is one where there are many Federal education officials, each promulgating their own rules, their own regulations, and their own paperwork requirements. There is inevitably some overlap and duplication. This increases costs for States and localities. For example, Illinois State Superintendent Joseph Cronin told the Governmental Affairs Committee that his State's education agency employs 20 individuals at average salaries of $15,000 each just to keep up with Federal paperwork.

The Governmental Affairs Committee has considered carefully the question of whether a Department of Education means Federal interference in State and local policymaking. States, localities, and institutions have the constitutional right to determine their own individual educational needs and policies. The Federal effort in education is designed to assist and complement States, localities, and institutions which provide education services. It has important programs in education which greatly benefit States and localities. For example, Federal programs designed to guarantee equal educational opportunities or assist in providing more opportunities for the handicapped to have a quality education are good examples of how the Federal Government assists States and local governments.

Thus, effective management, more visibility, and increased status does not mean "more control." Creating a Department of Education is not a "backdoor" way of controlling education in the United States. Instead, better management of Federal education resources by the Secretary of Education will mean improved accountability, coordination, and advocacy.

I believe the bill before the Senate is a product that reflects careful study.

The bill will significantly improve the design and management of Federal education programs.

It directs the new department to involve parents, students, and the public more directly in developing and implementing education programs.

It stresses the importance of maintaining good intergovernmental relations, and closer cooperation with State, local, tribal, and private agencies.

It balances educational interests by placing them on an equal footing with each other.

It works toward strengthening interagency coordination of Federal education programs.

It gives proper recognition to and increased status for the Department's many and varied components. The bill names high-level officers for:

Intergovernmental relations. An Assistant Secretary will insure a State and local perspective on a continuing basis in all the Department's activities and will work with the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education in advising the Secretary of intergovernmental problems, progress, and concerns.

Research and Improvement. An Office of Educational Research and Improvement, containing the National Institutes of Education, the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education, the National Center for Educational Statistics, and certain science education programs, will assist in the development of new knowledge about the educational process.

Occupational, adult, and community education. This officer will provide needed visibility for education assistance to States and localities in delivering effective education and training and adult community services.

Madam President, the Department has widespread public support. I ask unanimous consent that the list of the more than 70 organizations which support the concept of a Department of Education be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. RIBICOFF. As my colleagues know, President Carter and Vice President MONDALE have attached a high priority to the establishment of the Department of Education this year. The committee has worked closely and harmoniously with the President's reorganization project for the past year in developing S. 991.

Madam President, for too long education has suffered for lack of attention, status, visibility, and focus in the Federal Government. The Federal education effort is considerable in size. The new department would consist of programs having a total budget of approximately $17 billion. It would rank in size higher than six other Cabinet departments.

Federal education programs are too important to be mismanaged or smothered in bureaucracy. The Federal education effort must be efficient, effective, and helpful to States, localities, and other agencies.

We need a Department of Education, and I urge my colleagues to support this measure.

Mr. DONENICI. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I yield.

Mr. DOMENICI. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that Letitia Chambers and Eileen Winkelman of my staff be granted the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Madam President, if the Senator will further yield, I ask unanimous consent that Mary Ann Simpson of my staff be granted the privileges of the floor during the consideration of the pending legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN) be added as a cosponsor of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I do want to point out that no person in this body is more concerned with the education of our young people than the distinguished Senator from Alabama. The late Senator Jim Allen was a cosponsor of this legislation. I

The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) for himself and Mr. MELCHER proposes unprinted amendment No. 1841.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 57, strike out lines 12 through 20, and insert the following:

(b) The transfer of functions from the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of the Interior shall not modify or eliminate any eligibility requirments for participation in programs administered by the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of the Interior which were in existence on the date before the date of enactment of this Act.

(c) The trust responsibility of the United States as contained in treaties, laws, and Executive Orders, administered by the Secretary of the Interior on the day before the date of enactment of this Act for the education and training of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts shall be continued by the Secretary and shall not be altered in any way.

On page 57, line 21, strike out "(c)" and insert "(d)".

On page 56, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

(e) The provisions of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act shall be applicable to all functions administered by the Secretary through the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education—transferred by this Act to the Secretary from the Secretary of the Interior or the Department of the Interior

(f) The provisions of the Indian Self Determination and Education Assistance Act shall be applicable where appropriate to all shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may hold hearings. Any vacancy in the Indian Council shall not affect its power to function.

(f) The Indian Council shall—

(1) advise the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education concerning priorities and guidelines for the administration of all functions of the Office of Indian Education established in section 211;

(2) advise the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education with respect to the administration (including the development or regulations and of administrative practices and policies) of any educational program in which Indian children or adults participate or from which they can benefit, including title III of the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-First Congress), and section 810 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965;

(3) review appliactions for assistance under title III of the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-First Congress), section 810 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, and section 314 of the Adult Education Act, and make recommendations to the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education concerning the approval of such applications;

(4) evaluate programs and projects carried out under any program of the Department or the Department of Health and Welfare in which Indian children or adults can participate or from which they can benefit, and disseminate the results of such evaluations;

(5) assist the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education in developing criteria and regulations for the administration and evaluation of grants made under section 303(b) of the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-First Congress) and for other functions of the Office of In-talked with him directly in fashioning this bill. I know what this legislation meant to him.

In many conversations over the past months with the present Senator from Alabama, MARYON ALLEN, she has continuously expressed her concern that we give the children of Alabama and the children of this Nation the best possible education.

We do not believe that the huge expenditures that are being made by the Federal Government today are properly doing the job that has to be done. So much remains to be done that I consider it a privilege and most important to have the Senator from Alabama cosponsor this legislation with us.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call re rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1841

(Purpose: to refine certain provisions relating to Indian education)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be immediately considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

(6) provide technical assistance to local educational agencies, institutions, and organizations to assist them in improving the education of Indian children; and

(7) submit to the Congress not later than June 30 of each year a report on its activities, including—

(A) recommendations concerning the improvement of Federal educational programs in which Indian children and adults participate, or from which they can benefit; and

(B) a statement of the recommendations of the Indian Council to the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education concerning the funding of any such Federal programs for Indian children and adults.

(g) With respect to the functions of the Indian Council under paragraphs (3), (4), and (6) of subsection (f), the Indian Council is authorised to contract with any public or private nonprofit agency, institution, or organization for assistance in carrying out such functions.

(h) From the sums appropriated pursuant to section 400(d) of the General Education Provisions Act which are available for the purposes of section 411 of such Act and for part D of such Act, the Secretary shall make available such sums as may be necessary to enable the Indian Council to carry out its functions under this section.

REPEAL AND REDESIGNATION

SEC. 218. (a) Section 422 of the Indian Education Act is repealed.

(b) Any reference to the National Advisory Council on Indian Education in any rule, regulation, or law other than section 422 of the Indian Education Act shall be deemed to refer and apply to the National Council on Indian Education established under section 217.

On page 75, line 10, insert "and trust responsibilities" immediately after the word "functions".

On page 82, beginning with line 23, strike out through line 4 on page 83 and insert the following:

"(e)(1) Any function administered by the Office of Indian Education established under section 211 and which is subject to section 12 of the Act of June 18, 1934 (25 U.S.C. 472), or any other Indian preference law in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act shall continue to be subject to such law."

On page 40, in the table of contents, insert immediately after item Sec. 216. the following:

"Sec. 217. National Council on Indian Education.

"Sec. 218. Repeal and redesignation."

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, as a long-time supporter of legislation to create a separate, Cabinet-level Department of Education, I am most pleased that S. 991 has reached the Senate floor today, and hope for its prompt passage. The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee deserves high praise for its commitment to the bill and for its successful effort to bring it to the floor before the close of the 95th congressional session. I commend particularly my able colleague, (Mr. RIBICOFF), and my able colleague (Mr. PERCY) for their leadership in this effort.

I believe it is time to take the "E" out of HEW. Educational matters are not receiving the high priority attention they deserve under the present structure at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. I do not believe that is S. 991 proposes that Indian education be transferred from both agencies to the new Department, and creates an Assistant Secretary for Indian Education to administer the programs.

I have long been concerned about the quality of education in schools administered by the BIA, since approximately one-half of all Indian children drop out of these schools before they reach the secondary level. The major mission of the BIA is not (nor was it meant to be) education. By moving Indian schools administered by the BIA to an agency whose sole responsibility is education, I believe the quality of education for our Indian students can be improved significantly. At the same time, the BIA, relieved of the responsibility for running schools, can focus more clearly upon its major missions so that it can more effectively serve the Indian people.

As a Senator from a State with the second largest Indian population in the Nation, I have been very active on behalf of my Indian constituents, and thus have a great interest in all issues affecting Indian people. Because of this interest I attended a portion of the hearing held on this school issue by the Government Affairs Committee. On reading the testimony from the various tribal groups and Indian organizations, I noted that the Indian people are split on this issue, with some favoring the transfer while other groups fear that the transfer would have an adverse effect.

In analyzing the testimony, four major themes were apparent. First, many feared tion Assistance Act to functions admin- Assistant Secretary for Indian Education.

This amendment assures that the provisions of the Indian Self-Determination and Educational Assistance Act apply: First, to programs transferred from the Secretary of Interior without modification, and second, to programs transferred from the Secretary of HEW when such programs are consistent with the intent of that act.

Mr. President, in the bill before the Senate, Indian education is transferred to this new Secretary of Education and to the new department.

Mr. President, the fourth objective of the amendment that is pendinng will:

Create a National Council on Indian Education to be appointed by the President from nominees submitted by tribal organizations. This Council will have extensive responsibilities, including advising the Secretary concerning the administration of all programs for Indian children and setting priorities and developing guidelines, regulations, and evaluations for all functions administered by the Office of Education.

The Council will submit to the Congress each year a report on its activities, along with recommendations for the improvement of Federal education programs serving Indian children and adults.

As a Senator concerned with the needs and the rights of our American Indian population, I feel this amendment will protect their interests while providing an anyone's fault; I just do not think it can happen with a combined department. All too often, educational matters get lost in the shuffle at this burgeoning bureaucracy. Our Nation's commitment to the expansion of educational opportunities necessitates a separate Department of Education devoted solely to educational matters. Support for the measure runs high in my State among educators and parents. It is my hope that the new Department of Education, once it is created, will be more truly responsive to the educational needs of educators and consumers of education programs throughout the country.

My position in favor of this legislation might best be summarized by the closing remarks in my testimony on this issue which I presented to the Governmental Affairs Committee:

> I am an advocate of education. I believe our children are the greatest resources of this country. Just as individual children need attention from their parents and teachers, so education needs priority attention from the Federal Government. I believe the Congress should establish that priority by creating a separate Department of Education.

While I am a strong supporter of S. 991, I do have concerns about the section which includes Indian education programs in the new Department. While I support the transfer of Indian programs to the new Department, do have questions concerning specific legislative language affecting this transfer.

Responsibility for Indian education is currently split between the Office of Education in HEW and the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the Department of the Interior. that the transfer would abrogate the trust responsibility of the U.S. Government with regard to Indian children. Second, there was concern that program eligibility requirements would be changed, eliminating some current pargram eligibility requirements would be changed, eliminating some current participants. Third, there was concern that the gains made by passage of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act would be lost. And finally, some felt that the Indian tribes and Indian people would have no control over the schools.

These issues raised by Indian organizations are certainly valid, and I agree with the assessment that a transfer which does not address these issues could have a negative effect for Indian people. I have therefore studied the language of S. 991 and found that certain changes need to be made in order to assure a transfer which will protect the interest of our Indian and Alaskan Native population.

Mr. President, I have sent to the desk an unprinted amendment. It is now under consideration. This amendment addresses the concerns expressed by Indian tribes and organizations. This amendment will:

First. Assure that eligibility requirements for program participation are not modified in any way by the transfer.

Second. Clarify that the trust responsibility of the United States with regard to Indian education will be continued unaltered by the Secretary of Education.

Third. Clarify the applicability of the Indian Self-Determination and Education opportunity for vast improvement in Indian education programs. The most important considerations are our Indian children and the education and opportunities available to them. Therefore, I strongly support the transfer of all Indian education programs to the new Department of Education, with the changes contained in my amendment.

Mr. President, I ask the distinguished chairman and floor manager of the bill if he will engage in a colloquy for clarification purposes with me?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I am pleased to.

May I express my gratitude and appreciation to the Senator from New Mexico for his constructive support. I find it absolutely essential to rely on those Members of this body who have special knowledge and experience in various fields.

The Senator from New Mexico, I believe, has probably one of the largest populations of Indian children in all the 50 States. His experience and knowledge of Indian affairs and Indian education is absolutely essential to assure that what we are doing will actually benefit the Indian children.

I am more than pleased to engage in a colloquy with the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank my good friend.

Let me say, as the Senator knows and as I indicated in my opening remarks, there is not unanimous feeling on this issue among the Indian people. But I do believe the distinguished Senator had a similar experience at one time when we were talking about Indian health years ago.

Mr. RIBICOFF. May I say, when I was designated a member of the Kennedy Cabinet, one of my first discussions with President Kennedy was the basic concern and problem with Indian health and Indian education. The President asked me to look into these matters. I was appalled at the low state of health and education given to the Indians at large cost and what we considered a poor job being done by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

When I was Secretary, we did get around to doing something about Indian health and transferring it out of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and into HEW where it became a matter of prime concern and prime importance in trying to improve it.

I am sure the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and the distinguished Senator from Arizona on this floor will attest to the great improvement in every phase of health for the Indians, especially in the Western States where they have a large population.

I left the cabinet and never did get around to the second phase of President Kennedy's directive about Indian education. But I did always feel in our surveys that the Indian children were being shortchanged, that for the large sums of money we were spending we were not giving the Indian children the benefit of the education they deserved.

It is my hope that in transferring Indian education to a Department of Education, where it is up front, we will have someone who is concerned with education, who has orders from Congress to do they certainly are not going to control it.

Mr. DOMENICI. As I understand it S. 991 specifically mandates that existing Indian preference laws, where now applicable, shall continue to be applicable in the new Department. Is that right?

Mr. RIBICOFF.: Again, the Senator is correct. The committee fully supports the aims of Indian preference in employment in the programs aiding Indian education. We believe Indian preference should be strengthened in the new Department's Office of Indian Education. Under this bill, Indian preference will continue to apply in exactly the same way it now applies.

However, I do want to point out that the committee does not intend that, under this legislation, Indian preference apply to those schools contracted for under the Indian Self-Determination Act by Indian tribes. Those schools should continue to have the right to hire their own qualified Indian and non-Indian educators, as they wish.

Mr. DOMENICI. I also understand that S. 991 provides for the continued application of the Indian Self-Determination Act in those programs transferred from the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Am I correct?

Mr. RIBICOFF. That is correct. As the Senator knows, it has been 3 years since Congress passed into law the Indian Self-Determination and Educational Assistance Act. The full impact of this landmark legislation has yet to be felt in Indian country. The committee strongly [sup-]fice for Civil Rights authorized in the bill a separate branch for Indian affairs. We believe this will be a strong step to insure that Indian people will not lose their "Indianness" by this reorganization. The Office for Civil Rights will most likely be concerned with maintenance of the trust responsibility, Indian preference in employment and contracts, self-determination and other important rights of the Indian people.

Mr. DOMENICI. As the distinguished floor manager knows, my amendment on Indian education abolished the existing National Advisory Council on Indian Education and replaces it with a new council with broadened jurisdiction.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I commend the Senator from New Mexico for taking this step. It is clearly evident that the mandate of the existing council is not sufficiently broad enough to cover all of the new transferred authorities of the new Office of Indian Education. The new council will go a long way toward giving Indian people more input at the Washington level. I would hope, however, that the President would make a strong effort to reappoint those members now on the existing council to the new council so that they may complete the remainder of their terms. Does the Senator from New Mexico concur with that recommendation?

Mr. DOMENICI. I certainly do.

Mr. President, I thank Senator MELCHER for his assistance in this matter. His support and cosponsorship of this amendment indicates his dedication to the educational needs of our young Indian people.

something about improving the education of Indian children. I know there are some who would like to keep it where it is, but the safeguards of the rights of Indians in self-determination, trust responsibility, and Indian preference must be maintained.

The amendment that has been offered by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, joined in by the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER), whose State also has a large Indian population, improves what we seek to achieve and makes certain that our objectives are spelled out clearly in the act.

I express my appreciation and gratitude to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I understand that the report of the Governmental Affairs Committee on this legislation specifies that the programs, services, and funds administered by the Assistant Secretary for Indian Education not be channeled through State education agencies. Is that correct?

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Senator from New Mexico is absolutely correct. The committee feels there will be more efficient use of Federal Indian education funds whenever there is a direct funding relationship between the Federal Government and Indian tribes and organizations. By transferring these programs to the Department of Education, we do not intend that these Indian education programs be connected to or administered by State education agencies. This is not to say, however, that we are discouraging States from aiding Indian education, but supports the concept of self-determination. We want to make absolutely certain the new Assistant Secretary for Indian Education and the new Office of Indian Education recognize the importance of self-determination and take strong steps to implement the law. We fully expect self-determination will be reinforced and strengthened as a means for increasing the level of local control of education by Indian people.

Mr. DOMENICI. How will S. 991 affect existing eligibility standards for Indian education programs?

Mr. RIBICOFF. The legislation preserves all eligibility standards, of both the Office of Education (HEW) and the BIA Indian education programs. They will not change as a result of this transfer.

Mr. DOMENICI. How will programs and services for school construction be affected by S. 991?

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Governmental Affairs Committee fully intends that with the transfer of the BIA school system, funds and authorities for the construction and improvement of Indian schools will also be transferred to the Department of Education.

Mr. DOMENICI. I think it is important that the new Department fully recognize the special and unique nature of the Indian people's "civil rights." Has the committee considered this?

Mr. RIBICOFF. Yes, the committee has indeed given serious thought to the protection of these unique "rights." The committee report directs the Secretary of Education to establish in the new Of-

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I am pleased to yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I hardly know where to start my discussion, because I understand that the pending business is the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, which I probably will support but which I have some qualms about, and that the basic business that confronts us in this early discussion is the transfer of Indian education to a central bureau of education. So I will address myself first to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, with some remarks that will apply to any solution we might try to come to relative to Indian affairs.

I am proud to represent my State of Arizona, which has more native Indians than any other State in the Nation. In fact, almost 25 percent of the native Indians of our country live in Arizona. There are 15 different tribes, speaking three different basic language roots, living on 19 different reservations, or about 27 percent of our land.

Mr. President, that very fact should spell out to my colleagues what always has been a basic problem in approaching Indian affairs. We say we want to solve the Indian problem. Well, there are 400 tribes within the continental limits of the United States and 300 tribes in Alaska, and each tribe has a different, specific problem. So when we say we are going to solve the problem of the American Indian, there is no such thing, and there is no way we can do it in one fell swoop.

However, if you were to ask me to name a problem that has been common to all tribes down through the years we have been abusing our Indian friends, it would be education; and if you were to ask my appraisal of the Bureau of Indian Affairs' approach to education, I would have to say that over the years it has been rather dismal.

However, I am happy to report that there has been a turn, particularly in my State, where, as I say, we have native Indians. They speak their own language. They are not too anxious to learn English. They have their own cultures; they do not want to lose their cultures. They have their own religions, and they do not want to lose them. This has been the problem that was set up between the Indian tribes and the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

For example, a young Apache from the San Carlos Reservation—this example could be applied to any one of the tribes—would be sent to a BIA school, where the first thing he was told was that he had to learn English. Most Indian children want to learn English, because they know that, sooner or later, they have to use it in commerce or in getting along with their white friends. But then the BIA approach would be, "You have to forget the culture of your tribe, because you are going to live among a white population whose cultures are different," and the Indian began to rebel.

The Apache did not want to lose the culture that had been handed down

So what happened? When it became very apparent that in some of our larger tribes, the Navaho, the two Apache tribes, the Hopi, and I must say, Mr. President, that as to our tribes—and this is another problem—our tribes range from maybe 25 members to over 100,000 members, and this is true across the United States. So that presents a problem. But what happened when this rebellion set in? A number of us, who were close to the Indians and who lived with them, talked to the BIA and pointed out where they were wrong, that they should not take the attitude that culture was wrong, that the Indian had to change his religion, and we urged them to confer with tribal leaders and chiefly with members of the families, and when these conferences ended the BIA gave up on these ancient approaches and now they teach the native tongue where this was never done before.

Mind you, that is not easy because in the case of the Navaho language, the Hopi language, the Apache languages, which are related to the Navaho, there is no printed language. There is no alphabet. There is no printed vocabulary. So we were successful in getting the BIA to change so that today they stress their native language by teaching it, and I must say very happily that it is also available to white students in our colleges. These languages are so difficult to understand that, for example, as to the Hopi language, I have only known one white man in my life who could speak it, and it was used, as Senators know, dur-

Position of Federally Recognized Tribes or Organizations Representing Federally Recognized Tribes on Transfer of BIA Education to Department of Education

State, tribe or organization opposed to transfer:

Alaska: Akiak Village, Alaska Federation of Natives, Association of Village Council Presidents, and Tanana Chiefs.

Arizona: Ak Chin Community Council, Arizona Inter-Tribal Council, Cocopah Tribal Council, Colorado River Tribal Council, and Fort McDowell Mohave-Apache Community Council.

Havasupai Tribal Council, Hopi Tribal Council, Hualapai Tribal Council, Kaibab Tribal Council, Navajo Tribal Council, Papago Council, Salt River Pima-Maricopa Community Council, San Carlos Council, White Mountain Apache Tribal Council, Yavapai Apache Community Council (Camp Verde), Yavapai-Prescott Board of Directors, and Yavapai Tonto Apache (Payson).

California: Barona General Council, Big Pine General Council, Bishop Tribal Council, Cedarville Rancheria, Covelo Community Council (Round Valley), Dry Creek Tribal Council, Fort Bidwell Community Council, Fort Independence General Council, Hoopa Valley Business Council, La Jolla General Council, Laytonville Generel Council, Lone Pine Tribal Council, Manchester Community Council, Morongo General Council, Pala General Council, Pauma Gen-Council, Pechanga Tribal Council, Rincon Business Committee, San Manuel General Council, San Pasqual General Council, Santa Rosa General Council Rancheria, Santa Rosa General Council Reservation, Santa Ynez General Council, and Soboba General Council.

Tuolumne Community Council, Twenty-nine Palms General Council, Viejas Tribal through the centuries—a culture, I must say, on which those of us who live in the Southwest depend upon very heavily for our own cultural sources.

Then came the problem of religion. Some of our tribes—such as the Hopi Tribe and the Zuni Tribe in the State of New Mexico—have more than 250 gods. Some of them worship legends. Some, like our Navaho people, will find their gods living on five different mountains, and every mountain has something to do with an aspect of their life. They believe in these things.

For example, the Navaho, who weave the beautiful rugs, were taught that the "Spider Woman" taught them how to weave; and out of respect to the "Spider Woman," they always leave a little hole in the blanket, so the "Spider Woman" can get through it. This has been handed down.

They still practice in their religion what we call sand paintings, which, in effect, become an alter for the person who is being prayed for.

When the Bureau of Indian Affairs began to tell the Indian child that he would have to give up these concepts of religion and take up white man's religion the Indians really rebelled. In fact, it got so bad that up to about 15 years ago the Indians would not allow their children, in the main, to attend schools. This was not true across the board. We had some tribes who lived much closer to white communities than the one I have been talking about where they more or less in a natural way had taken on many of the things that the BIA tried to teach. ing World War II in the Pacific, in the open, and it so confused the Japanese that they gave up ever trying to understand either the Hopi or the Navaho.

They now stress culture, the importance of the Indian child retaining the ability to produce pottery, to produce baskets, to produce rugs, to produce silver, and so forth and so on.

They stress their religion and stress their language, although they do stress English to the point that the Indian children learn it.

Mr. President, there is no great feeling of unanimity amongst the Indian tribes in this country in having their education transferred to one central agency.

I have, for example, a list here of practically every State, and in each of these States practically every Indian tribe is represented as being opposed to it.

My friend from New Mexico, of course, shares with my State the gigantic Navaho population, and yet in his State the Mescalero Apache Tribal Council, the Navaho, the Picuris Pueblo, and the Tesuque Pueblo Council all oppose it.

In my State every tribe opposes it, and I am going to have this printed in the RECORD, Mr. President, so that my colleagues will have the benefit of knowing the tribes in their State that now oppose the transfer of education to a central agency.

I ask unanimous consent that this list be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Council (Baron Long), Resighnini Rancheria, Inter-Tribal Council of California, Big Laguna Rancheria, Bridgeport Indian Colonoy, Cold Springs Rancheria, Hopland Rancheria, Stewart's Point Rancheria, Cycuan Reservation, and Table Mt. Reservation.

Colorado: Southern Ute Tribal Council, and Ute Mountain Tribal Council.

Florida: Micoousukee Business Committee, and Seminole Tribal Council.

Idaho: Coeur d'Alene Tribal Council, Fort Hall Business Council (Shoshone-Bannock), Idaho Inter-Tribal Conference, Kootenai Tribal Council, and Nez Perce Tribal Executive Committee.

Iowa: Sac and Fox Tribal Council.

Kansas: Iowa Executive Committee, Kickapoo Tribal Council, and Prarie Potawatomi Business Committee.

Michigan: Bay Mills Executive Council, Hannaville Community Council, Inter-Tribal Council of Michigan, Keweenaw Bay Tribal Council (L Anse), Michigan Inter-Tribal Education Committee, and Saginaw-Chippewa Tribal Council (Isabella).

Minnesota: Boise Forte Reservation Business Committee, Fond du Lac Reservation Business Committee, Grand Portage Reservation Business Committee, Leech Lake Reservation Business Committee, Mille Lacs Reservation Business Committee, Minnesota Chippewa Tribal Executive Committee, Red Lake Tribal Council, and White Earth Reservation Business Committee.

Montana: Blackfeet Tribal Business Council, Chippewa Cree Business Committee (Rocky Boy's), Crow Tribal Council, Flathead Tribal Council, and Fort Belknap Community Council.

Nevada: Duckwater Shoshone Tribal Council, Fallon Paiute Shoshone Business Council, Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribal Council, and Shoshone Paiute Business Council (Duck Valley).

Washington: Chehalis Business Council, Colville Business Council, Kalispel Business Committee, Lower Elwha Community Council ...

... ucation programs from the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the proposed new Department of Education.

We are opposed to the Domenici-Melcher amendments, which do not meet the wishes or needs of American Indian Tribes.

American Indian people believe it is the proposed transfer, itself which would be harmful; and that no amount of perfecting amendments will protect our efforts to provide the best education possible for our children.

Sincerely,

ALBERT W. TRIMBLE,
Executive Director.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I do not want to seem overly critical of putting education in one department, but I can recall when I first came to this body nearly 25 years ago, I wholeheartedly opposed Federal aid to education and I grew to be known as an opponent of education. No. I was an opponent of the Federal Government having anything to do with the education of my children in the elementary schools.

I do not think we have to look far to find out that those of us who opposed Federal aid to elementary education were absolutely right. I think I can withstand any argument that never in the history of this country has elementary education been at such a low level as we find it today, and the States are very rare that can turn out acceptable students for colleges from their elementary school system.

I do not want to risk having a central bureau of education. I am going to oppose this when it comes to a final vote.

So I am going to vote for the Domenici amendment, because I think it is worth a try, and I am going to oppose putting Indian education under any central agency.

Lord knows, it is bad enough now without messing it up more by putting it under some Federal bureaucracy.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has benefited from listening to the discussion by our distinguished colleague from Arizona, Senator GOLDWATER, who has had a lifelong interest in Indian affairs and has probably done more than any other individual of whom I know to further their legitimate interests and to assist them in every way to stand on their own feet and to be proud Americans.

I know that this comes as probably somewhat of a surprise, but we have 20,000 American Indians living in the city of Chicago. Certainly, regarding the education of those who have decided to move to an urban community, such as Chicago, there is an absolute necessity for them to have a command of the English language.

The Senator from Illinois has been disturbed that once the Indian leaves the reservation, in a sense, and moves into an area like Chicago, the reach, assistance, and help to the American Indians has not always been there.

The Senator from Illinois would have to really disagree, however, with my distinguished colleague that there has been cil, Lummi Business Council, Makah Tribal Council, Nisqually Community Council, Puyallup Tribal Council, Spokane Business Council, Squaxin Island Tribal Council, Tulalip Board of Directors, Upper Skagit Tribal Council, and Yakima Tribal Council.

Wisconsin: Great Lakes Inter-Tribal Council, Inc., Lac Courte Oreille Governing Board, Lac du Flambeau Tribal Council, Menominee Restoration Committee, Oneida Executive Committee, Red Cliff Tribal Council, Sokaogon Chippewa Tribal Council (Mole Lake), Stockbridge-Munsee Tribal Council, and Wisconsin Winnebago Business Committee.

Louisiana: Chitimacha Tribal Council and Coushatta Tribal Council.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that a letter from the National Congress of American Indians, which also opposes this transfer, be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

September 15, 1978.

Re S. 991.

Dear Senator: On behalf of the National Congress of American Indians, we wish to reaffirm our strong support of the floor amendment to be offered by Senator Stevens to delete the proposed transfer of Indian Ed-because I have seen no proof that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has adequately handled the educational problem at our elementary level. Forget the college level. The Federal Government has been tied up in colleges ever since we have been a republic. It sometimes makes me laugh to hear people talk about the separation of church and state when this Federal Government has been supporting some of our largest colleges ever since we drew up a declaration.

So, Mr. President, I hope that when the time comes for a vote on the Domenici amendment we can agree to it. I do not think it will do a lot of good, because we have too much dissension between the Indian tribes, and the Senator knows it.

It took us over 25 years in Arizona to bring our 15 tribes together so that they would even talk to each other. It was sort of a victory like we celebrated last night. And even with them now talking to each other we do not get much done, because they are still dominated by one big tribe and the little tribes do not like that.

I do not see how moving Indian education under one department is going to help them, because we have not solved the basic problem of really how to educate them, and I doubt seriously that a department that has not yet contributed anything to the betterment of education amongst white children can hope to do any better in the education of the children of some 400 tribes within our continental limits and 300 tribes in Alaska.

any relationship between the poor quality of education we may have in various areas of the country at the primary level, and the Federal Government's becoming involved. I think the Senator from Illinois would have to say that the quality of education would have been worse. I cannot see that the 8.2-percent average provided in Federal support for the education of our children is in any way controlling our educational system. It is an assist and a help in many areas. There is too much paperwork involved and too much in administrative costs and I would prefer block grants, but I do not think that we can say that the Federal Government is controlling education.

The first priority must be put on moving toward a balanced budget. But as we can relieve costs in other areas we will probably have to assist in education more, providing we can do so in such a way that it leaves control absolutely in the hands of the local community without the hand of the Federal Government intervening.

I would like to go to the amendment of my distinguished colleague, Senator Domenici, because the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. Yes, of course.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has brought up yet another problem, and that is regarding those Indians who move from reservations to the cities. Here again you will find no general pattern.

For example, on the reservations of New Mexico, Utah, and Arizona, where the native Indians live, most Indians who go to school, graduate from college, go back to live with their families to try to improve the life of their families.

I might say that at the present time, and I believe I am right, we have now over 3,000 graduate degrees among our college people; I think we have now 10 Ph. D.'s, two lawyers, and one doctor, and this has been done, I must say, without the aid of the Federal Government. It has been done with tribal funds.

When the Senator gets to the question of what happens to an Indian who comes to Chicago who cannot handle English, then there is a different problem. I think that is a problem that can be handled. If an Indian decides to leave the reservation, I think in the school system of every city there should be a training school—I forget what we used to call it—where basic skills are taught, where the English language is taught so that if he wants to stay, he will not work with any handicap.

We find, say, a Navajo who wants to leave a reservation and come down South to work in the field, he has very little trouble getting along, because he has had a basic knowledge of English. But this is just another problem.

Before the Senator engages with my friend from New Mexico in colloquy I will point out that my chief worry about Federal aid to education has always been that the Federal Government has got its hand too far into the business of running schools in my district. They tell our school system what books are appropriate; they establish standards for teachers; they establish standards for maximum leeway in the local community and at the State level. That kind of approach strengthens the Federal system, and I hope we can move in the direction of bloc grants.

Now, to return to the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. As I understand it, the amendment now before the Senate would create a National Council on Indian Education; clarify the applicability of the Indian Self-Determination Act and Education Assistance Act to functions which would still be administered by BIA; clarify the trust responsibility of the United States regarding Indian education; and assure that the eligibility requirements for program participation not be modified in any way by the transfer.

If that is the correct understanding of the amendment, the Senator from Illinois would certainly find this an improvement over the pending legislation, and would find it very acceptable. I know of no objection on this side of the aisle.

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator is correct in his assumption of what it does. As I indicated in my remarks regarding my amendment—and the Senator from Illinois was unavoidably detained at that point—we went through the record of the hearing and found that wherever there were objections by the Indian people or Indian tribes and groups that basically they fit in these categories, and we have attempted to cover all of them by this amendment as best we could. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Lenora Moragne the need of the American Indian people, and I do not think it meets their objections as they presented them to the committee and presented them to those of us who attempt to speak for the Indian people here in the Senate.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, the Domenici amendment is acceptable to the manager of the bill. I think it is an excellent amendment. It improves the bill and helps clarify any questions on Indian education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota was seeking recognition next.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I just want to say that I would like to be heard a little bit longer in debate on the Stevens amendment, but I will not be able to be present, because I have another commitment I have to get to now. But, before the Senate acts on this amendment, I would like to say a word or two about the Stevens amendment and the proposal by the Government Affairs Committee to transfer Indian education out of the Bureau of Indian Affairs into the new Department of Education.

This is one of the most difficult decisions I have had to make since I have been in politics. The reason is that a great many Indian tribes—not all of them, but a great many—are opposed to a transfer of Indian education functions out of the BIA.

I do not pretend to speak for the Indian people in any respect, but I want to try to describe the relationship between the Indian tribes and the Bureau of Indian Affairs since I have pay. The National Education Association, I think we can say today, is probably the most powerful union in the United States.

My children are all educated or have been exposed to it and have taken various degrees. But I would rather have the parents of my grandchildren have something to say about what the school is going to be like. If they do not like the books that are being used they have a right in Maricopa County, Ariz., to say so, not to be told by some bureaucrat 2,500 miles away in Washington "We know what is best for your child." That, I have to say to my good friend from Illinois, is my basic worry.

I agree with him if we can make this money available in block grants, just write out a check to the State of Illinois or the State of Arizona and get the meddling and no-nothing hands of Washington out of it, I think you would see a great improvement in our educational system.

I thank the Senator for allowing me to finish my little colloquy.

Mr. PERCY. I appreciate the Senator's comments very much, indeed. I think in revenue sharing we have demonstrated that we do best on the Federal level by raising the money and then granting it back to the States and local communities in such a way that there is a minimum of overhead. One-thirtieth of 1 percent is the estimated cost of supervising the revenue-sharing program, which dispenses 6.5 billion a year. We set that up originally so that there would be a minimum amount of paperwork, a minimum amount of bureaucracy, and a of Senator DOLE's staff have the privileges of the floor during the discussion of and votes on the pending legislation; and also Alan Bennett of the Governmental Affairs Committee staff, and Eric Hultman of the Judiciary Committee staff, have the same privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I shall not oppose the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, but I want to make it clear that it does not obviate the need for my amendment, the amendment I shall offer, as soon as the Senator from New Mexico's amendment is disposed of.

It is my understanding that the committee will accept the Domenici amendment. The National Congress of American Indians and all of those with whom I have been working, in connection with the problem pertaining to the transfer of Indian education programs from the BIA to the new Department of Education, are opposed to the Domenici amendment.

I see no reason to have a vote on it, however, because in the event my amendment is adopted, it would strike the section that the Domenici amendment would amend, and it is my understanding that my amendment would carry with it the language of the Domenici amendment in the event it would be adopted.

I just want to make certain the Senate understands that this amendment is not acceptable to the American Indian tribes. It does not have the support of the organizations which do articulate been privileged to deal in the area of Indian affairs. It is a kind of love-hate relationship. In fact, they severely and vehemently dislike the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the patronizing attitude and manner with which the BIA treats tribes and the Indian people themselves. But any time that anybody says "We are going to abolish the BIA" or abolish one of the functions of the BIA, the Indians are the first to rush to their defense.

The reason for that is, I think, that the Indians feel the BIA is all they really have. They are pretty vulnerable. They are subject to attack by the dominant society, by the power establishment in any community in which they live, and they are very much afraid to have any other agency try to represent them, even though they will be the first to confess that the Bureau of Indian Affairs does the poorest job of anybody they can imagine. I do not think any Member of this body will disagree with that.

So my policy has always been to try to do legislatively what the tribes have indicated they wish or want me to do. I would say this is the first time I have departed from that, and I want to make clear my reasons why I am supporting Senator RIBICOFF's and Senator PERCY's attempt to transfer the Indian Education Office out of the BIA into the new department.

I support it simply because I think the very vicious training ground of Indian politics, which is manifested primarily in the area offices around the country, has taken over in this case. Any time the Bureau of Indian Affairs and its very practiced bureaucrats see a threat to their survival, to their jobs, to their positions, they run to the tribes and say, "This is tantamount to termination."

The word "termination" to Indians is a word like "extermination" is to Jews; it is that serious to them. Any time the Bureau of Indian Affairs talks to the Indian people and says "You are going to be terminated" by this law or this action, they immediately rush to the defense of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and that is the design. That is deliberate. That is exactly why the bureaucrats do it.

In this instance, I believe the best thing that can happen for the country and for the Indian people is to transfer education out of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the hopeless state in which it is found in that agency. I do not know how well the Department of Education will do it, but they cannot possibly do it any worse than the Bureau of Indian Affairs has done, and for God's sake I hope they can do it better.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ABOUREZK. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I find myself in absolute and complete accord with my friend from South Dakota in his remarks about the BIA. They do try to prevail on Congress, they do try to prevail on the tribes.

But as I said before the Senator came to the floor, as bad as the BIA has been, I think we have in HEW a perfect example of how not to run the country. That is the major reason why I am going to support this bill. Too often when outstanding educators come into HEW to administer education programs, they feel the frustration, they feel the lack of progress that has been called to our attention by the distinguished Senator from Arizona. We realize, with all the money we are spending and the lack of progress that is being achieved, the time has come to pull all the education programs under a Secretary of Education who has the necessary authority.

Just a year ago the Commissioner of Education had to go to a conference with the President at the White House. When he came to the gate, the attendant at the gate did not know who he was and would not let him in. You cannot imagine that happening with a member of the Cabinet; at least he could come in by the door. The Commissioner of Education cannot come in the front door.

I am deeply impressed with the discussion that has taken place. I think it is most important to have this discussion between the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Alaska, the Senator from New Mexico, and the Senator from South Dakota, because we are involving here men who have specific knowledge and experience with Indians and Indian education. The time has come to bring these matters out in the open, because the statistics we have on Indians show that Indian education is an absolute disgrace, that the Indians are being shortchanged. We find that the record shows that today the achievement rates of Indian students continue to stay far below the national average. Dropout rates for Indian rights. This has been doubly assured by the Senator from South Dakota.

The Senator from South Dakota has talked to me numerous times, and he has told me of his concerns. He has told me about the rivalries. He has told me of his commitment to the welfare of Indians. I do not think anyone in this country has to have an explanation from the Senator from South Dakota when it comes to Indians, and everything that has to do with Indians and human beings. I welcome his support for this improvement.

May I say to the distinguished Senator from Arizona, irrespective of when or how this bill comes into existence—and I hope that the Indian education will be part of this measure—I personally will continue to work with the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from New Mexico, the Senator from South Dakota, and the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Resources, the Senator from Rhode Island, to assure that we improve the education of Indian children.

I think one of the great disgraces in America in the treatment of the lowest ebb of any segment of the American population must be reserved for the Indians of our Nation.

Out of this colloquy, I am positive will come a great improvement in Indian education, the colloquy from the people on this floor who are for this measure and those who are against this measure.

I express my appreciation and gratitude to the Senator from South Dakota, ing to object to transferring this function, not that I think they are going to be any better off under BIA, particularly, but at least we have the BIA moving more in the Indians' direction now than they ever have before. I have seen such disastrous results to education under HEW that I cannot abide the thought of extending that to any other group of people. I just hate to think of an education department having anything more to do with teaching white children or black children or Mexican-Americans. They just are not geared to do the job, and the major reason, I believe, is that they are under the complete domination of the National Education Association. I would rather take my chances as a part of the BIA than to join the new Department of Education.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a moment, I think this colloquy between the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from South Dakota indicates the need for a Department of Education.

I agree completely with my distinguished colleague that education under HEW has not done the job. Let me explain something to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

In a period of 12 years, we have had 13 different Commissioners of Education. There has been no continuity. The Secretary of HEW has so many programs, so many tasks, and so many burdens, the one segment of the department that gets the least attention is education. That was a concern of mine when I was Secretary, and it has been a concern of every succeeding Secretary. When these outdian children at the elementary and secondary level exceed 50 percent. Dropout rates for Inlian students in post-secondary institutions exceed 75 percent.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the deep knowledge of the mores, experience, and customs of the Indians in Arizona as related by the Senator from Arizona. That is the first I had ever heard it. I respect it, and I respect the need and the desire of the Indians to preserve their traditions. I love traditions. I do not want to eliminate tradition. I think it is absolutely essential that we keep in continuity the past, the present, and the future. A society disintegrates which dishonors the past.

But what we are seeking, with the help of the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from South Dakota, is to try to assure that as a result of this debate and discussion, when the Secretary of Education comes into office, when there is an Assistant Secretary for Education in Indian Affairs or Indian Education, they will look at this record and understand that there is a concern.

The concern is not just on the part of Senators from States with Indians; it is a concern that every American has, a concern that every Senator has, to improve education and not to neglect the Indians, not to neglect the Indian children.

That is why I accepted the amendment by the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Montana.

I felt that what they were doing was nailing down, and nailing down tightly, that there would be no encroachment whatever on Indian prerogatives and the Senator from New Mexico, and the Senator from Arizona, whether they support this proposal or not.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I think what Senator GOLDWATER said about educational programs in HEW severely lacking is very accurate. I do not disagree with that at all. Like Senator RIBICOFF, I am very hopeful [illegible] things will improve under the Department of Education.

I want to say another word about the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and the area directors in particular who have mastered the art of Indian politics to probably the highest degree. One director of the Indian health service said in my presence once that Indian politics would be a good training ground for anybody who wants to run for President. I think it is probably true. It is the most cutthroat kind of politics I have ever seen in my life. Anybody who has been involved in it would not disagree with that.

I was going to use another word there but I thought better of it. [Laughter.]

In any event, I had a hearing earlier this year on the Bureau of Indian Affairs. One of the witnesses used to be a superintendent in the Bureau of Indian Affairs. He later came on my staff as an Indian specialist after he left the Bureau of Indian Affairs. In fact, I hired him from the Bureau of Indian Affairs. He had more knowledge of the internal operations of the BIA than anybody I had ever seen. He was a critic of the BIA who had worked for them for years and maintained his honesty and independence all that time, which is very difficult to do.

He described the actions of the area directors and those other politicians, bureaucrat politicians, in the Bureau of Indian Affairs. He described them with two words: survival management. He said it is survival not of the Indian people, but of the bureaucrats in the BIA. That is all they are concerned about, nothing else. Survival of their jobs, of their positions, of themselves. And the more the Indians fail, the more happy they are and the more successful they become. That is exactly what it is.

No matter how bad it is in the Department of Education or in HEW, I do not think it can be as bad as in the Bureau of Indian Affairs. I will say why. Even though they stopped the practice, for a number of years they were experimenting on Indian children on how to get rid of the Indian problem by getting rid of Indians. They did it by taking children out of their homes. They took them away from their mothers, took them to a broading school, and never let them see their families again.

They have stopped that practice, thank God. But who knows when this bunch of experimenters will start it again? If there is a permissive Congress, if there is nobody here jumping at them, they might just try it all over again. They say one way to treat the Indians is this way and another is that way, but, "We know what is good for the Indians."

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ABOUREZK. I yield.

When it comes time to getting these children in school, talk about a problem of busing. We have been wagonning and busing Indian children as long as I can remember, trying to get them to the few schools that we can afford. I do not advocate that we build a school at every crossroads. We could not do that.

For example, children who live where the Senator and I have just visited, in Black Mountain, live 40 miles from the nearest high school. So they ride horseback or they walk and stay in the town where the high school is.

This is not going to be an easy problem to change. I would hope that we could magically bring these seminomadic peoples into living in the communities where they could develop schools, hospitals, and their own industrial abilities.

I might mention that when we are talking about Indians, particularly the Indians I know, we are not talking about what I would call dumbbells. The highest IQ's known to this country come out of the Hopi Indian children. Do not ask me why. We have been investigating that for years. But I can say that standing outside the Indian school in Phoenix will be all of the electronics people from the factories around Phoenix, waiting to grab ahold of a Hopi young man. Here is a young man who probably never saw a light bulb before he went to school. Yet give him 2 months on schematic drawings and he can outproduce any white man in the institution. Why? We do not know.

over time. The Senator is entitled to whatever time he wants.

Mr. STEVENS. I have the management of the time on this side. Does the Senator from Oklahoma wish some time?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, I should like to speak on this if someone will yield to me. I do not know whether the Senator has any time or not.

Mr. RIBICOFF. There is a half hour on the Domenici amendment, but I would be pleased to yield on the bill to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. DOMENICI. I wonder if the Senator from Oklahoma would have any objection to adopting the Domenici amendment? I understand the Senator from Oklahoma wants to oppose the transfer. However, this has nothing to do with the Domenici amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wanted to speak very briefly on the amendment. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. Fine.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I have here from Albert W. Trimble, executive director of the National Congress of American Indians, the letter which was introduced earlier by the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER). In that letter, on behalf of the National Congress of American Indians, he expresses strong support of the floor amendment by Senator STEVENS. He also opposes the Domenici-Melcher amendment, which does not, according to him, meet the needs or wishes of the American Indian tribes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I cannot argue with what the Senator said about the Bureau of Indian Affairs. I fought this group before I got into politics. I have tried my influence on every President I have known. I have tried all during my life to get something done about it. As the Senator said, they are a pretty powerful bunch. I think one of the mistakes I made in 1964 was I did not go to their school long enough.

If the Senator will further yield for a moment, I just want to relate a problem or two that we are going to be faced with, and which the BIA is faced with.

I have to say that in my first 12 years here I served on the Educational Subcommittee and I had the pleasure of being chairman of it for one term. The distinguished chairman from Connecticut has mentioned the record of Indians. I think if we took it across the board, the record might even be worse. We can take isolated cases of isolated tribes where their school attendance records are as good as the whites, where their ambition to go further in education is every bit as good as the whites. I cannot say that these are in the majority by any means, but they do exist.

The Senator from South Dakota is well aware of the problem that I am going to mention. The biggest tribe in this country, the Navaho tribe, almost 140,000 people, live in what we call seminomadic conditions. They do not live in pueblos like the Hopis, Zunis, and other tribes in our Southwest. They live in isolated family groups. Here there may be two or three hogans, which is what they call their house, and over here, 10 miles, is another one.

Two of the best men I have ever appointed to the military academies have been Hopi Indians. They outperformed the whites all around the periphery of the big reservation.

So, again, we are not dealing with people who do not have basic knowledge. We are dealing with people who just have not had exposure to schools. I must say where they have been exposed to schools they have not been the kind of schools we would like to see.

In summing up, Mr. President, we do have problems. I do not care whether it goes over to another bureau or remains with the Bureau of Indian Affairs; getting our Indian children to school or getting them to stay in school is not an easy thing.

I think of one more thing. One of the prosperous crops of my Navajo Indians is what we call the piñon nut. It comes off the pine tree. Every first frost of October, all the kids quit school and go out and pick piñon nuts. Those are the little things that happen out of adherence to their family ways of life and their culture, their religion. We are not going to solve this thing, as much as we would like to. If the move is successful to put this under one bureau, I shall help in every way that I can, because I should like to see the education of our Indians improved. I should like to see their chances improved with the white people when they go out to work among them.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOMENICI and Mr. BARTLETT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INOUYE). Who yields time?

Mr. RIBICOFF. There is no control

My personal opinion is that the Domenici amendment really does not do anything. It does not really provide any needed clarification. Therefore, it is just a sort of camouflage for the bill itself.

I am very concerned about the bill. I am tempted to talk on the bill because the other Senators were discussing provisions that are in the bill, but I shall not do that. I just want to express my opposition to the Domenici amendment and that I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I understand the basic issue as to whether or not Indian education should be transferred to the Department of Education. I hope we will hear a lively debate on the transfer issue this afternoon.

In all deference to my good friends (Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. GOLDWATER), who have indicated that there is Indian opposition to this Domenici-Melcher amendment which clarifies the treaty language, I do believe that the opposition is based upon opposition to the transfer in toto, not to the clarifying amendments. I cannot imagine that they would really be opposed to a clarification which stipulates that the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act still applies after the transfer.

I cannot imagine that Indian preference and its clarification being attendant on transfer are opposed by these various groups.

I do not believe that a National Council on Indian Education advising the Assistant Secretary would be opposed. I believe the opposition stems from the fact that many of those groups—and I acknowledge that—do not want the Bureau of Indian Affairs to get out of the education business at all. It is for that reason that they oppose the amendment.

I yield my time and move the adoption of the Domenici amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the privilege of the floor be granted to Richard Jerve of the staff of the Committee on Human Resources; Mark Ash and Allen Bloom of Senator METZENBAUM's staff; Tom Polgar of Senator MORGAN's staff; and Karyn Mandan of Senator CRANSTON's staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from New Mexico for his clarifying amendment. I think it is a very useful and good thing to have.

I also want to say how much our Subcommittee on Education has appreciated the opportunity of working with the Committee on Governmental Affairs toward this excellent bill that has emerged. I am delighted at the opportunity for cooperation that has been given to our staff and to us.

The bill that is before us, I think, is a truly excellent one, one in support of programs as social security and medicare rise annually.

As a result, the portions of the HEW budget which are subject to the annual appropriation process continue to feel the squeeze of static funding. Education, as the largest controllable program area in HEW, is always the area that budget-cutters look to first as they seek to keep funding at a reasonable level.

Cabinet-level representation for education would allow education to be judged on its own merits, rather than in competition with other domestic programs with scarce dollars. It would also provide for direct access to the President of the voice of education.

This voice deserves to be heard, for education is vital to our Nation's continued growth and development. More than 65 million people are involved in education enterprises, nearly one in every three of our citizens. Surely an "industry" of this size and scope deserves Cabinet rank.

Finally, I note President Carter's deep commitment to the creation of a Department of Education, and I applaud him for that commitment.

In conclusion, I wish to say what an excellent job I believe the Senator from Connecticut, as chairman of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, has done, and what a fine bill it is. Think how many years it has taken to emerge, and, thanks to the Senator from Connecticut, it is finally adopted and voted on.

BURDICK, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. GRAVEL, and Mr. MATHIAS proposes amendment numbered 3568.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

which I am glad to rise. It creates a Cabinet-level Department of Education. I have long supported such a department and I am proud to be an original cosponsor of this legislation.

Why? The education division alone has a budget of $9.1 billion, more than the budget of four Cabinet agencies. Yet this division, made up of the offices of the Assistant Secretary of Education, the Office of Education, and the National Institute of Education, would be only a part of the Department of Education as envisioned in S. 991. S. 991 would also include in the new Department the Education Directorate of the National Science Foundation, along with the school lunch programs, the overseas dependent schools, Indian education, now as clarified by the excellent Domenici amendment, and college housing programs.

While I recognize that inclusion of these programs may be controversial to some of my colleagues, I believe that the Senate should support as broadly-based an Education Department as possible.

Current education efforts are fragmented among a lareg number of agencies, with no mechanism to coordinate their provisions or to measure their impact on States, school districts, and institutions. A single department would provide the structure for such coordination.

In addition, it is my belief that funds for education are kept artifically low by the very structure of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. More than 90 percent of HEW's budget is considered uncontrollable, as costs of such

Mr. RIBICOFF. I thank the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island because, under his leadership, we have made great strides in education. The Senator from Rhode Island is concerned and knowledgeable in this entire field. His support for this Department has great significance and meaning, because his responsibility in the authorization process in all education programs gives him the special insights into why we need this Department.

Accompanying him in this support is the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. Magnuson), chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Hardly a day goes by that Senator Magnuson does not ask me, "When is this bill coming up?" Because of his responsibility for education appropriations, there is no one in this body who is more concerned with the necessity of having a separate Department of Education to make sure that the job is being done and the full amount of taxpayers' value is being received from the sums we are spending in the field of education.

AMENDMENT NO. 3588

(Purpose: To eliminate the transfer of Indian education programs from the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary, and for other purposes)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 3588.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these amendments be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is with deep regret that I rise to oppose the chairman of our committee with regard to one of the provisions of this bill. Although I am not a cosponsor of this bill, I do believe in the establishment of a separate Department of Education.

I do believe, however, because I was called on as a member of the Governmental Affairs Committee to chair the hearing when the Indian people from throughout the country came in to object to this particular provision that my amendment would delete, or the total

As has been stated, and the Senator from Oklahoma put the letter from the National Congress of American Indians in the RECORD, they do not feel the Domenici amendment protects those rights and they oppose the bill's provisions even as amended by the Domenici amendment.

I spent a substantial portion of my career in the Department of the Interior and was Chief Counsel of the Department of the Interior.

I know the defects of the BIA operation as it has applied to the Indian trust responsibility despite the good intentions of the BIA.

The Indians themselves have been very forceful in their criticism of the BIA operations. But to be categorical and to be concise and candid about criticism does not mean they seek to do away with the entity that now is showing responsiveness to their needs.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs has had the historic responsibility of fulfilling treaty and statutory obligations to the tribes for over 100 years. This is what the Indians refer to as trust ressponsibility. With it go the assurances that include tribal involvement in te development of Indian policy, standards for recognition, and eligibility of members of the federally recognized tribes for services, assurances of Indian preference in hiring, and processes for implementation of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.

Just 3 years ago we passed the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, which was a functions, the BIA programs, away from BIA and put them in the new Department of Education, a department that has no track record, a department that deals with different committees in the Congress, both authorization committees and appropriations committees. It deals with people that had nothing to do with Indian affairs and will have nothing else to do with it except as it might involve the Department of Education.

If self-determination means anything, it means the Indian people ought to be listened to in terms of how Congress reacts to their demands.

I think that nothing will show that the Federal Government speaks still with forked tongues to the Indian people than to do this, to transfer the Indian function for education to the new Department of Education against their will.

People talk about self-determination around here. The Indians have spoken and we have an obligation to listen to them.

The whole point of self-determination is to allow the decisions affecting Indians to be made in the tribal council rooms and not in Washington, D.C.

Congress jeopardizes that commitment if we allow this transfer against the express wishes of the American Indian people.

Self-determination is just now beginning to take hold firmly in the Indian community. Ten years ago there were two tribally operated contract schools. Now there are 35, and a number awaiting contracts when funds become available.

concept of my amendment would delete, the transferring of the Bureau of Indian Affairs' schools and education programs from the Department of Interior to the new Department of Education, that it is incumbent upon me to speak at some length about it.

The Indian people of our country made a great case when they came before the Governmental Affairs Committee and pleaded with us to delete these provisions that would transfer the BIA schools and education programs from the Department of the Interior to the new Department of Education.

I say this without criticism of other members of the committee because I know we are all busy, but I was there alone, and these people came in from throughout the country, distinguished leaders of their own communities, who represented a great many Indian tribes that have existing relationships with our Federal Government, and they opposed this provision.

There are some from the Indian community who disagree. But the overwhelming majority of the American Indian people oppose the transfer of the BIA schools and education programs as contemplated by this bill.

For example, the National Tribal Chairmen's Association and the National Congress of American Indians, representing over 200 tribes nationwide, testified against this transfer at the hearing I chaired. At that time it was quite clear that the Indians oppose this administratively forced transfer. They oppose it because they feel that the bill does not adequately address trust responsibility or their tribal sovereignty rights.

sistance Act. This act recognizes the obligation of the United States to respond to the strong expression of the Indian people for self-determination by assuring maximum Indian participation in the direction of educational as well as other Federal services to Indian communities, to make these services more responsive to the needs and desires of those communities. I am convinced that we are breaking the promises we made in that legislation if this forced transfer of BIA schools and education programs is mandated by the Congress.

Mr. President, as one who served for some 6 years on the Interior Appropriations Subcommittee of our Appropriations Committee in the Senate, let me point out one of the major defects in this proposal.

All of the Indian matters that come before the Appropriations Committee are in the Interior Appropriations Subcommittee coverage.

We deal with housing programs, we deal with employment programs, we deal with community programs of water and sewer, we even deal with the health service that normally would be in the HEW budget.

We deal most specifically with the educational needs of the Indian community in relationship to all of the other requirements for Federal funding.

I think the record is clear that we have had an increasing response to the requests of the Indian community as they have come forward under the Indian Self-Determination Act to be more and more involved in the education of their children.

Now it is proposed to take the school

Indians and Alaskan Natives are going to college for the first time in significant numbers. These college-educated Indians hold the promise of a better future for Indian education, better than the new megastructure such as the Department of Education could provide.

A promise was made to the Indian community by this administration that tribal leaders would be consulted before initiating changes that would directly affect them.

This bill is in direct violation of that promise. The least we can do in the Senate is to respect the stated wishes of the native Americans and provide an opportunity for tribal input before restructuring Indian education programs.

The House Committee on Government Operations wisely chose to leave the Bureau of Indian Affairs schools and education programs in the Department of the Interior.

I realize some of my colleagues may object to leaving schools and education programs with the Bureau of Indian Affairs because of the shortcomings of the Bureau's past efforts in education, and those have been commented upon here before. As I said, as the ranking minority member on the Interior Appropriations Subcommittee, I know something of those complaints, too.

Some of my colleagues in the Senate may be familiar with a GAO study completed recently outlining the problems in BIA education. This study has identified areas where improvement is required and has recommended changes. The Bureau deserves the opportunity to try to correct these problems, and the Indian people who are becoming more and more in control of BIA deserve the right, under self-determination, to try to bring the Bureau around as they believe it should be operated under the Indian Self-Determination Act. I do not think we will accomplish anything by sending these same problems over to a new department of education, which will be disorganized and getting its feet wet in many other pressing issues.

But it needs a track record first, to justify the support of the Indian people over the Bureau, when the Bureau now has shown, in recent years, an inclination to make the changes that are requested by the Indian people.

Several years ago, Dr. Rufus Miles, of Princeton, who was formerly Director of Administration at HEW, did a study on a Cabinet level Department of Education which served as the basis of the legislation before us today.

It was Dr. Miles' recommendation that the Indian education programs remain in the Bureau of Indian Affairs because the Office of Education has no trained professionals in school administration and cannot fulfill the goals of the Indian Education and Self-Determination Act. He further stated that moving Indian education to the Department of Education would be an encumbrance on the new Department and hamper its chances for success. If the Indian schools were poorly managed, it would lead to severe criticism of the top level management of the new Department, thus tending to subordinate the Department's leadership activities which set it apart from the grant and loan processing functions of the present Office of Education. It is quite possible that the native American community may, at some future date, choose to have the BIA education programs included in the Department of Education. The point is that the choice should be theirs. Other than producing a nice diagram of Federal education activities, I would challenge any of my colleagues to tell me how the lot of the individual Indian child will be improved if the Indian education programs are consolidated in this new department. They will have the same teachers, the same books, the same building, and the same funding. But they will lose control, because under the BIA, the Indian people now know they have control over their education programs.

The education budget of the Bureau of Indian affairs is the single largest account—and one of the largest within the entire Department of Interior. However, it pales in comparison to the title I programs, impact aid funding, and basic educational opportunity grants of the Office of Education. The BIA education function in connection with the HEW education budget is miniscule, but it is extremely important to the Indian people. In Interior, the problems stand out, and thus the Interior Appropriations Subcommitte is in a position to push for improvements that are necessary. In the Department of Education, attention will be focused on the big money accounts involved in the new Department of Education. I can see that the Indian people do not want that to happen, and they want a way to guarantee that it will not happen. So they have asked many of us personally to take an interest in this bill for the purpose of trying our best to take out of this bill the proposals to transfer the BIA education programs to this new department.

I cannot emphasize enough the importance of the Indian self-determination act during consideration of this new department. The American Indian community is watching us to see if we will live up to that commitment we made, in which the Federal Government—Congress and the Executive—promised Indian control over Indian programs to the maximum extent possible. If we force this transfer, against almost the unanimous objection of the tribes, we will have done irreparable damage to the Federal relationship with the Indian tribes and Alaskan Native people. Congress will have demonstrated to the Indian people that the Federal Government does not truly believe that Indians are capable of knowing what is best for themselves; and in the final analysis, without regard to their views, Congress and the executive branch will have the final say.

I urge that the Senate adopt this amendment, which has been cosponsored by Senator YOUNG, Senator GOLDWATER, Senator CHILES, Senator ANDERSON, Senator BARTLETT, Senator CHURCH, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator HANSEN, and planning responsibilities to those of the day-to-day administration of a school system.

Let me emphasize that. Nowhere else in the Federal Government is there day-to-day administration of a school system as there is in the Indian area.

If the Department were successful in significantly upgrading the level of Indian education programs, it could lead to pressures for the Federal Government to become more directly involved in the day-to-day operations of schools throughout the Nation.

So, in addition to being a poor alternative from the point of view of the Indians, so far as the original proponent of this Cabinet level Department of Education is concerned, it was a no-win proposition for the new Department to be saddled with this additional responsibility.

All of the other programs which are being put into the new department are now part of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. The school nutrition programs and the Head Start programs will remain in their current status. Some might say that these programs are not truly educational in nature and that Indian education is so we need to consolidate all of the Federal efforts in this area.

The significant difference between BIA education programs and the other Federal educational activities is that the Bureau, in many instances, acts as a local educational agency. The Bureau is responsible for hiring teachers, determining curriculum, building maintenance, building construction, running boarding schools, and a host of other ac-and the Indian education program will be the forgotten stepchild. Grants-manship is what gains attention in HEW. The individual Indian child and his family count at the Bureau.

The Office of Indian Education, now part of the Department of Education, has not, in my opinion, and that of the Indians, proved to be a success. They fund a program for 1 year only—with no guarantees for a continuation grant. Just as the people have begun working on the part B and C program funded in 1 fiscal year, they have discovered that they will not be refunded for the next year. Education in the Indian community cannot work that way. A long-term commitment must be made. We cannot allow the education of Indian children to be affected by every new educational fad which sweeps the Nation. With the Bureau programs offering the only opportunity for direct Federal intervention in education from kindergarten through college, I can foresee the native American children being used as guinea pigs for every new scheme developed by the National Institute of Education, the Office of Bilingual Education and the Office of Civil Rights. The way this bill now stands, we have no guarantee that this will not happen.

This would be the only operation portion of the new Department of Education. In the day to day operation of schools, in the maintenance of schools, this is the only involvement in the curriculum directly from a Federal level.

Within this new department, if this bill is passed as it stands, is the perfect test tube area to try out all the new dreams and schemes of those people who are in-

Senator BURDICK, Senator JACKSON, Senator MATHIAS, and my colleague from Alaska. This would leave the Indian education programs where they are, in the Department of the Interior, where the Indians feel they have the most recognition and will receive the best treatment in the future.

Mr. President, I take great pleasure in announcing that the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, my good friend from Washington, Senator JACKSON, supports this amendment.

I call attention to the fact that after this year is passed, the jurisdiction over Indian affairs will revert to his committee.

I note also that Senator BARTLETT, who has been the ranking Republican on the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, opposes the provisions of the bill and supports my amendment.

We have contacted over 200 tribes or Indian organizations that have asked to be listed as opposing the transfer of these function to the new Department of Education.

I point out, significantly, that leading that list is the Alaska Federation of Natives, which represents 201 Indian, Eskimo, and Aleut villages. About 75,000 Native American people in the AFN oppose the provisions of this bill, as I have stated.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the position of these organizations which represent these federally recognized tribes be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material tirely possible that they would accept and support a transfer of these functions to the new Department of Education after it has developed a track record. But they should not be compelled to accept what other people think is best for them.

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I have cosponsored Senator STEVENS' amendment deleting the transfer of the Indian education programs of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of Education. A good many tribes in my State of Washington have opposed the transfer, including the Affiliated Tribes of Northwest Indians. This transfer would be a setback to Indian self-determination and to the ability of Indian people to control their destiny.

Transfer of these programs to a new, larger, and more diffused bureaucracy would reduce the effectiveness of the Indian education programs by making it ever more difficult for Indian tribes to maintain personal and effective relationships with the Government personnel responsible for Indian programs.

The concept of self-determination is less than 8 years old. That concept, along with Indian preference, is just beginning to make its impact on the BIA, its administrators, and the Indian tribes. The Federal Government does have a special responsibility to provide adequate education for Indian people. The last thing we want to happen is for the children to suffer. Tribal control of education and other contract services is crucial to the continuing improvement of the socioeconomic condition of the tribes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is my hope that those people who represent these Indian tribes and organizations and the States from which they come will take heed of their position.

Again, I emphasize that the Indian people have informed me that they do support the new Department of Education but they do not support the transfer of these functions to it.

They also have indicated to me that, if they are properly consulted and if the terms under which the transfer will take place in the future were explained to their organizations and discussed with them and their tribal councils, it is en-

Over my term in Congress, I have consistently opposed bills which would decrease the control all people, and particularly Indian people, have over their own lives and the education of their children. I, therefore, oppose the transfer and support Senator STEVENS' amendment to delete the transfer from S. 991.●

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Jill Porter, of Senator MATHIAS' staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, while I am a cosponsor of S. 991 to create a Cabinet-level Department of Education, I am opposed to those provisions of the bill that would transfer American Indian Schools and education programs from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, Department of the Interior, to the new Department.

The overwhelming majority of American Indian tribes, and the national organizations that represent the tribes' interests, such as the National Congress of American Indians and the National Tribal Chairmen's Association, are against what they perceive to be a forced transfer of their educational programs against their best interests and the best interests of their children. American Indian tribes across the country have contacted the Congress to oppose the transfer.

I urge my colleagues to listen to the virtually unanimous voice of the Indian people in this matter and join the tribes in their efforts to have the transfer deleted.

Felix Cohen, the eminent jurist and former solicitor for Indian Affairs of the Department of the Interior, once proposed a matter-of-fact definition of self-government. Self-government, he said, means that form of government in which decisions are made by the people most directly affected. American Indians have left no doubt that they believe a forced transfer would be harmful to their efforts to make a better life for themselves and their children.

It is now more than 30 years since Felix Cohen proposed his simple definition of self-government, but less than 4 years since Congress said essentially the same thing when we passed the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act (Public Law 93-638), by overwhelming margins. One of the findings of Congress in that act, whose purpose was to mandate the right of American Indian tribes to operate their own educational as well as other programs, was that:

> The prolonged Federal domination of Indian service programs has served to retard rather than enhance the progress of Indian people and their communities . . . and has denied to the Indian people an effective voice in the planning and implementation of programs for the benefit of Indians which are responsive to the true needs of Indian communities.

The hopes aroused by the Indian Self-Determination Act are, the tribes believe, just beginning to be fulfilled. Ten years ago there were two tribally operated contract schools, today there are 35 and a Department of Education which S. 991 would establish.

Self-determination has been the paramount desire of Native Americans throughout our history, but it is only in recent years that Congress has seriously responded to this most basic of all human rights. The efforts of Robert F. Kennedy in my own State of Idaho focused congressional attention on the necessity of Indians' being responsible for their own affairs. I joined those efforts, and they led to the enactment of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, Public Law 93-638, as recently as 1975.

S. 991 would establish a Cabinet-level Department of Education, and I support that concept. Nevertheless, I must strongly oppose the provisions in S. 991 which would dismantle Public Law 93-638, and would, in my judgment, represent yet another abrogation of a promise by the United States to Native Americans.

Mr. President, the importance of this issue is underscored by the fact that Idaho Indian Tribes are unanimous—together with the vast majority of Indians throughout the country—in support of the Stevens Amendment. I submit for the Record correspondence I have had from the All Idaho Indian Conference and on behalf of every Idaho Indian Tribe.

Mr. President, I have been impressed repeatedly over the years with the fact that Indians alone hold the ability to solve Indian problems, and they must reau of Indian Affairs to a new executive department, and

Whereas, this transfer would jeopardize specific trust responsibilities obliged on the Government of the United States of America under treaties executed and in force between the United States and the sovereign Indian Tribes and their governments, and

Whereas, the proposed new department will not be charged with specific responsibilities focused on the special and diverse Indian Education concerns, and

Whereas, Bill S-991 will transfer Indian Education programs from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, an agency organized to recognize Tribal sovereignties and to implement trust responsibilities of the United States Government to Indian Tribes, and

Whereas, Bill S-991 will create administrative problems for Tribal Governments who rely on the Bureau of Indian Affairs for the execution of Indian Education Programs, and

Whereas, Bill S-991 will, in effect, abrogate the trust responsibilities of the United States Government to the various Indian Tribes with regards to Indian Education and force Tribal Governments to compete for educational funds with numerically larger groups of people, and

Whereas, there are no provisions in Bill S-991 to provide a policy of Indian Preference in hiring within the proposed Department of Education and,

Whereas, Bill S-991 is contrary to the statuatory objective of Federal Indian Policy, "an orderly transition from Federal domination of programs for and services to Indians, to an effective and meaningful participation by the Indian people in the planning, conduct, and administration of these programs."

Now, therefore be it resolved; the Idaho All Indian Conference, i.e. the five Indian Tribes within the State of Idaho, is in complete opposition to placing Interior BIA schools and number more awaiting contracts when funds are available. Ten years ago 2,660 Indian students attended college with the aid of BIA scholarships; today, 20,000 Indians do so.

Perhaps most important, the tribes believe that to transfer their programs against their wishes would violate the principle and spirit of local self-government. Indeed, to force the Indian people into the new Department against their will would be almost to guarantee from the outset the development of an inimical relationship in which educational progress would be impossible.

One of the purposes of S. 991 is to "encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the decisionmaking process relating to education." The decision of Indian parents, students, and communities is clear at this point, and I join with them in the hope that the Senate will respect their wishes and support them in their efforts to provide the best education possible for their children through the BIA.

There are no federally recognized Indian tribes in my State of Maryland. However, a danger to the well-being of American Indian tribes endangers all other minorities in our land. "And who of us," Felix Cohen asked, "is not a member of some minority?" ●

INDIAN SELF-DETERMINATION IN EDUCATION

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the Stevens amendment to S. 991, which would maintain Indian self-determination in their education programs, rather than eliminating it by incorporating them into the have the responsibility to meet them. These problems include education of Indian children. I urge the Senate not to renege on the promises we have made, and to adopt the Stevens Amendment.

IDAHO INTER-TRIBAL POLICY BOARD, INC.,
Boise, Idaho, April 18, 1978.

FRANK CHURCH,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: Representatives of the Idaho Indian Tribal Governments met in Boise, Idaho on April 12 through 14, 1978, to discuss issues of Importance to Native Americans. More than 150 Native Americans joined together to make their feelings clear to the public. Of special concern to the group attending the "All Idaho Indian Conference" is the disposition of S.B. 991: The Department of Education Act. The Conference unanimously agreed to condemn the act because of its counter-productive effects for Indian People nation wide. As chairman of the Conference, of the Idaho Inter-Tribal Policy Board, and of my Tribe: The Nez Perce, I ask that you consider carefully your position on S.B. 991 in light of the Resolution attached.

Respectfully yours,
WILFRED A. SCOTT,
Chairman,
All Idaho Indian Conference.

RESOLUTION

Idaho All Indian Conference, a conference of the peoples of the five Indian Tribes in the States of Idaho, Shoshone-Bannock, Couer d' alene, Kootenai, Shoshone Paiute, and Nez Perce, do hereby resolve;

Whereas, Bill S-991, the Department of Education Bill introduced by the Honorable Senator Ribicoff, is a bill designed to transfer the Indian Education Programs of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of Education, and

Whereas, the Conference expresses its opposition to any Indian related Education programs in Bill S-991 and efforts to transfer Indian Education Programs from the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the proposed Department of Education, and

Be it further resolved, the Idaho All Indian Conference urges the President and Congress of the United States of America to solicite the input from the various Tribal Government as to the future organization and direction of Indian Education Policy Development and Program Management.

The foregoing resolution has been adopted at the spring Conference of the Idaho Indian Tribes, April 12, 13, and 14, 1978 at the Rodeway Inn, Boise, Idaho.

PORT HALL, Indiana,
July 12, 1978.

HON. FRANK CHURCH,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The Shoshone-Bannock tribes of Indians is in support of Senator TED STEVENS' amendment to Senate Bill 991 (Department of Education bill). The amendment excludes the Bureau of Indian Affairs from the creation of the Department of Education. The tribes feel a split of the Bureau of Indian Affairs will erode the trust responsibilities and the United States' commitment through her treaties. We ask that the amendment be re-introduced on the floor.

GILBERT C. TETON,
Chairman,
Shoshone-Bannock Tribes of Indians.

COEUR D'ALENE TRIBAL COUNCIL,
Plummer, Idaho, May 4, 1978.

FRANK CHURCH,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHURCH: The Coeur d' Alene Tribe wishes to go on record as opposing S-

991 (The Department of Education Bill) introduced by Senator Ribicoff.

Specifically, we are concerned about the United States Government's trust responsibility to the Indian people and Indian Education. Under the proposed Bill, this new Department of Education will not be charged with specific responsibility to the special trust relationship of the Federal Government to Indian people and the specific concerns of Indian Education.

In response to Senator Ribicoff's letter to Charles E. Trimble (NCAI), we do not favor the transfer of any portion of the Bureau's Indian Education programs to a new and separate Department of Education. We feel that under the present system, we do control the direction of Indian Education and Indian Education Programs, which is Indian self-determination and in line with P.L. 93-638.

We as a small Tribe would not be able to compete numerically with the larger Tribes for Education funds. We also oppose the fact that there is no provision for Indian Preference in employment in this new Department.

Perhaps there is merit in the development of a separate Department of Education, however, there are many questions unanswered, plus the time factor did not allow for the thorough consideration of the proposal.

Sincerely,

Bernard J. LaSarte,
Chairman, Coeur d' Alene Tribe.

Whereas, S-991 (The Department of Education Bill) has been introduced by Senator Abraham Ribicoff, and

Whereas, this Bill is to establish a new and separate Department of Education and proposes to transfer the Bureau of Indian Affairs Education Programs to this new Department, and

Whereas, S-991 does not speak directly to the special trust responsibility of the United States Government to the Indian people and destroy by conglomerating Indian education funds and allocating these funds on competitive basis.

Your committee should not ignore the special educational needs of the many full-bloods that the Federal Government is especially responsible to and who continue to strive for their betterment in their education and employment goals.

1. (A). No—To include Bureau of Indian Affairs schools to a new Department of Education would greatly jeopardize the trust responsibility of the Federal Government and endanger the sovereignty of all Indian Tribes. Basically Bureau of Indian Affairs schools are an essential need for the education of many Indian students who are victims of neglect either through broken homes or death of their parents. Many of these students would not be able to function effectively in a public school situation and could possibly be destined toward correctional institutions.

(B). Yes—The selection of an all Indian School Board would be necessary, however, this board should be carefully screened before selections are made. This board should have dual concerns of upgrading the curriculum to equal public school standards and also to develop curriculum to stress the identity of the Indian students.

(C). Yes—Tribes will need representation at this level for recognition and services for their educational needs to all Reservation Indians. However, we are still opposed to the transfer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs functions to a new Department of Education.

2. No—The possibilities of this recommendation would endanger Bureau of Indian Affairs administered services of the Johnson O'Malley and Continuing Education Programs to reservation Indian Tribes. There are no assurances that the Johnson O'Malley and the Continuing Education Program people and native Alaskans of any Senator in this body.

I found his role on the Appropriations Subcommittee one of genuine concern about the issues of Indian education and Indian health. I have sought Senator Stevens' counsel on the many Indian problems I have encountered. However, on this particular issue, it appears to me that a decision to leave Indian education within the BIA assumes that the BIA will improve upon its record in the area of Indian education. I do not agree with that assumption.

The views of the Indian people on this issue have been listened to from the start. I have reviewed the entire record and I understand the concern that the Indian people have with the transfer. We are all traditional people, and they are among the most traditional people. Their concerns have been prompted by certain people within the bureaucracy.

However, with the adoption of the Domenici-Melcher amendment, they need not fear. What could their fears be?

The Bureau of Indian Affairs has not done a good job. I need not repeat what the Senator from Arizona, Senator Goldwater, said about Indian education and how poorly we have done. I need not repeat what the Chairman of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, Senator Abourezk, said about the matter.

My amendment protects the Indian trust relationship, the Indian sovereignty relationship, and Indian preference. It also creates an Assistant Secretary to the Education of Indian people, and

Whereas, the future of Indian Education Programs will be jeopardized if removed from the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Therefore, be it resolved that the Bureau of Indian Affairs Education Programs not be included within S-991.

CERTIFICATION

The foregoing resolution was adopted at a meeting of the Coeur d' Alene Tribal Council, held at the Coeur d' Alene Sub-Agency, near Plummer, Idaho on May 3, 1978 with the required quorum present by a vote of 5 for and 0 against.

Hon. ABRAHAM RIBICOFF,
U.S. Senate, Committee on Governmental Affairs, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR RIBICOFF: Submitted are comments from the Kootenai Tribe of Idaho as you requested in your letter of April 4, 1978. Consideration from the Tribe is focused on the Indian students at the reservation level and how a new Department of Education could be a deterrent toward successfully educating our Indian students in the future. The Tribal concern is whether the new Department of Education would recognize the unique relationship the American Indians possess with the Federal Government or would the American Indians be treated as just another minority. There are no assurances in the recommendations that Indian Tribes will be recognized for their sovereign rights through their respective treaties with the Federal Government. It is dangerously possible that the lack of understanding with the upper echelon in any new department of education could hinder or funds would continue to direct services to Indian Tribes.

3. To allow high priority to Reservation Tribes for funding, as major educational problems and needs exist within the public schools, Tribal schools and Bureau of Indian Affairs schools. More emphasis to encourage Tribes to develop a comprehensive long range plan to develop their goals and objectives accordingly without limitations to financial assistance from the Federal Government, and to enable Reservation Indian Tribes to achieve toward their objectives and goals.

The administration responsibilities should be focused at the energy level with the Bureau of Indian Affairs by the fact they are most familiar, as the Tribes are, with the existing reservation problems and needs for the improvement of Indian Education for our Indian students.

Sincerely,

DIXIE A. COOPER,
Chairperson, Kootenai Tribe of Idaho.●

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, will Senaor Percy yield me 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no restriction on time.

Mr. PERCY. There is no time agreement on the bill. The Senator may take whatever time he chooses.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, let me say at the outset that I support the transfer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs' role in Indian education to the new Department of Education. It is very difficult for me to stand and oppose the distinguished Senator from Alaska on a matter that concerns the Indian people. In my 5½, going on 6 years in the Senate I have found Senator STEVENS one of the strongest advocates of the Indian for Indian Education. Furthermore the amendment creates by statute a council to advise the Assistant Secretary on Indian Education. It appears to me that these are adequate safeguards and that our Indian people need not fear.

There is a split among Indians in my State on this issue. However, for the most part, the Pueblos in New Mexico support what I am trying to do. The all Indian Pueblo Council, which represents most of the Pueblo Indians in my State, is anxious to try the transfer, as long as my clarifying language is included in the bill.

Obviously, there is nothing to lose. I do not understand what my opponents believe we could lose. We protected the trust relationship. There is nothing sacred about Indian education programs being under the Bureau of Indian Affairs. That was also created by Congress, just as we are creating the Department of Education here today.

I recall talking with my good friend, Senator RIBICOFF, about Indian health. He informed me that he was the Secretary of HEW when Indian health was still in the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and I am certain the same arguments were made: "It has been run by the Bureau. The Bureau knows how to do it."

All the fears that are injected into this issue were injected then. Yet we moved Indian health out of the Bureau into the professional health delivery system of the U.S. Government, the Public Health Service.

I can attest, after 5½ years in the Senate, that Indian health is substantially better today than it was 5½ years ago.

I believe those who were here before me when Indian health programs were part of the Bureau would have to attest that it is many times better today than it was before. It is moving in the direction of providing some real health delivery opportunities to Indian people which never would have been there had Indian health matters not been moved to the Public Health Service.

I think the same thing is going to happen in Indian education. In this new department there will be a better chance for the Indian people of our country to preserve their traditions, their culture, and to receive the quality education they so richly deserve. I sincerely believe that our Indian people will be substantially better off shortly after the adoption and creation of this department. There will be a better opportunity for their voices to be heard. Unfortunately they go unheard today.

I am convinced that the new council which will be created by my amendment will have some real input to the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Indian People.

I greatly respect and admire the distinguished Senator from Alaska, my good friend from Oklahoma, Senator Bartlett, and the other Senators who share their views. However, I am firmly convinced of two things. There is no serious risk involved in this transfer. Second, there is indeed a chance that our Indian people will get a much better opportunity to be educated properly. The American people will get more for the elementary and secondary level exceed 50 percent;

Dropout rates for Indian students in postsecondary institutions exceed 75 percent.

The condition of Indian education is extremely poor. Indian education will simply not improve if it is left in the BIA. Should the Stevens amendment be adopted, we could expect another 150 years of stagnation by one of the most inefficient agencies of the Federal Government—the BIA.

Report after report, study after study has been issued over the years condemning the BIA's performance and suggesting corrective action.

Nothing has worked.

Even the moving and powerfully written Senate report, "Indian Education: A National Tragedy, A National Challenge," issued in 1969 under the direction of Senator Kennedy, has been largely ignored by the BIA. Few of its recommendations have been implemented. The poor condition of Indian education described in that report nearly a decade ago has not changed.

Indian education today is still a national tragedy.

Yet how can we expect an agency which is predominantly concerned with natural resources and land management to have the expertise and ability to improve Indian education?

The fact is nearly every Cabinet department has special programs for Indians in its field of expertise. For example, the Labor Department has a across the world, their per-pupil costs did not exceed $2,500 in 1977.

The sad reality is, in spite of these large sums of money, Indian students are receiving an education of very low quality. The American taxpayer, and the Indian people, are not getting the most out of their dollars.

The Federal Government has an obligation to provide Indian people an education of equal or superior quality to that afforded the rest of the country.

But today there is no comprehensive strategy for Indian education. The BIA has refused to develop one.

Indian education programs are fragmented between two different agencies—the Office of Education and the BIA. The $500 million we spend each year for Indian education is split nearly evenly between these two agencies. They rarely talk with each other. There is no coordination between the two.

The Federal Government has no high-ranking Indian education official to tackle these tough problems. There is a Director of Education in BIA and a Deputy Commissioner in OE. Both are submerged in bureaucracy. Since 1966, the average tenure of the BIA Education Director has been just 9 months.

These are all serious problems that cannot be remedied within BIA. In examining the past performance of the BIA, I can find no justification for leaving education in that agency.

The Governmental Affairs Committee consulted extensively with Indian people on this proposed reorganization. The Inthe money they spend on Indian education than they will if Indian education programs remain in the BIA.

I commend the committee not only for the entire bill but for the particular diligence they put into Indian education. They communicated with Indian leaders and Indian people across this land. They submitted questionnaires to Indian leaders and Indian people across the land. They set aside ample time for hearing on just this issue, and I commend them for that.

They could have been less diligent in this matter, which is a small part of the total function of the Department of Education.

As we conclude this discussion, I urge Senators to vote not only for this bill but for this transfer. If it does not work, we can do something about it later. I assure you that we have protected our Indian people as well as they are protected now. The chances of their getting something better for their children, in my opinion, really rests within the new Department of Education, not within the BIA.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, as floor manager of this legislation, I strongly oppose the Stevens amendment.

For the past 150 years, primary responsibility for Indian education has rested with the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The BIA's performance record is a national disgrace.

Today, achievement rates of Indian students continue to stay far below the national average;

Dropout rates for Indian children at $62 million Indian employment program, HUD has $30 million in Indian housing, and HEW has the $370 million Indian health service. Why should we leave Indian education out of the Education Department?

BIA's institutional weaknesses inhibit an effective Indian education policy. The Bureau's area offices usually view education as a secondary function. The BIA Director of Education has little input in the system.

Despite congressional mandates, tribes still have little influence or local control over Indian education. Fewer than 35 tribes have contracted with the BIA for school operations. The BIA has slowly implemented the Indian Self-Determination Act.

The Bureau's education budget has been mismanaged and spent inefficiently. In 1977, the BIA spent as much as $13,000 per student in its day schools, and as much as $22,000 per student in its boarding schools. The nationwide average per pupil cost for children in public schools in 1977 was $1,561, $2,000 less than the average amount spent in BIA day schools. For large sums like these, we could send Indian students to some of the finest college preparatory schools in the country, where tuition now averages just $6,000 or $7,000 per year.

Members of the Senate should note that the per-pupil costs for the Defense Department's overseas dependents schools—which will also be transferred to the Department of Education—are much lower than those of the BIA. Even though the DOD schools are spread out dian people had a number of legitimate concerns with the original version of S. 991. As reported by the committee, the bill before the Senate today addresses their concerns:

It sets up a distinct, tangible office in the new Department of Indian Education, headed by an Assistant Secretary. The office will be on an equal footing with other interests in the Department.

The bill contains a provision requiring the Department to uphold the trust responsibility.

It insures the transfer will not change existing eligibility standards of BIA and OE programs.

It provides specifically for the continuation of existing Indian preference laws in the new Department.

It amends the Indian Self-Determination Act to make its provisions fully applicable to the new Department.

The legislation directs the Secretary of Education to institute more local control of education by Indian people.

It provides for Indian representation on the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education.

The legislation provides for a 3-year phase-in period for BIA schools which will allow for the transfer to be conducted with little disruption and much consultation.

S. 991 will not terminate the Federal responsibility for assisting Indian education. It will enhance it. I believe it will be the single greatest improvement of the Federal effort in this area.

In 1961 when I was Secretary of HEW, we worked hard to complete the transfer of Indian health services from BIA to HEW. By all accounts, Indian medical services have dramatically improved since the transfer.

Likewise, I expect Indian education will improve greatly by the transfer we are considering today.

We are serious about doing something to improve the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. As long as it remains in BIA, it will never significantly improve.

I hope the Stevens amendment is defeated.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Secretary Andrus, Secretary of Interior, and an accompanying statement by the President of the United States, Jimmy Carter, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D.C., September 11, 1978.
Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing to urge your support for S. 991, the Department of Education Organization Act of 1978. The President considers this an important initiative, and urges passage this year. The creation of a Department of Education represents a vital step in increasing the Government's capacity to provide visible and effective leadership in addressing our country's educational needs.

Let me further urge support for the transfer of the Indian education programs now located in the Interior Department to the new Department. The Federal Government spends over $500 million annually on edu-

Indian tribes and Indian people in any way. These relationships include Federal trust responsibilities, Indian self-determination, and Indian preference in hiring. My goal is to improve the delivery of education services to Indians while maintaining these special relationships.

It is especially important that we maintain educational services to Indians without interruption, protect their civil rights, preserve the integrity of the education programs, and strengthen participation of parents, tribes, and Indian people in the education of their youth. A clear recognition of the importance of these issues will help us achieve an orderly, phased transfer of the BIA programs to the new department, while protecting the interests of Indian people. I expect and hope that Indian tribes and Indian people will work with my Reorganization Project staff to assure that these objectives are met.

Throughout the Nation, our educational systems are facing important challenges. For the first time, the new department will permit a coordinated and high-level response to these challenges. I ask Indian tribes and Indian people to join with us in shaping a new Department of Education that is responsive to their concerns and worthy of their support.

JIMMY CARTER.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I would like to say that I regretfully have to oppose the pending amendment for three reason, the first being the overriding reason for the transfer is the poor nature of Indian education. For example, 50 percent of Indian students entering elementary school will have dropped out before they finish high school; 75 percent of Indian college students will drop out. The from New Mexico on this matter, but it is quite clear to me, as the one who did chair the hearings, that their complaint is twofold: first, they oppose this; and, second, they vehemently object to the procedure which denies them the consultation they were guaranteed. They were guaranteed in the Indian Self-Determination Act the right to consultation, and they were guaranteed that by President Carter. President Carter sent a telegram to every tribal chairman, and promised that this administration would consult with the Indian people in their tribal councils before making decisions which would affect the Indian people.

I am not being political, because they came before me as I represented the chairman of the committee and all other members of the committee, and the record is clear, that it was the Indian people who raised this question of the commitment that was made to them that changes like this would not even be suggested without consultation with them in their tribal councils. Now that is the second portion of their objection, and I think it is valid, just as valid as their total opposition to the transfer itself, which is their opposition based upon the fact that they were not consulted as the President had committed his administration to consulting with the tribal leaders prior to making such a representation.

I again say to the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee, while we can have complete supcation programs for Indians, divided almost equally between BIA and the Office of Education. Placing all of these programs in one Department will permit for the first time a comprehensive approach to Indian education policy development and management.

Indian tribes and their members enjoy certain special relationships with the Federal Government, and great care has been taken to protect those relationships in S. 991. Self-determination policies, Indian preference in personnel actions, eligibility criteria, and the trust relationship have been protected by specific provisions in the bill. A separate office for Indian education reporting directly to the Secretary will give Indians a strong policy voice at the Federal level. To minimize disruption and ensure adequate consultation with all Indian people, S. 991 provides that the transfer of the BIA schools is to be phased in over a three-year period.

In a recent message, the President commented on the importance of the special relationships that the Federal Government has with Indian tribes and pledged that the transfer of the BIA programs would not diminish them. I am enclosing a copy of that statement. I believe that this offers a significant opportunity for improving Indian education.

Sincerely,

CECIL D. ANDRUS,
Secretary.

Enclosure.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 19, 1978.

Under my proposal for a Cabinet Department of Education, the Indian education programs now located in the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) would be moved to the new Department. I have recommended this transfer because I believe it will make Federal school-based programs more effective.

This transfer will not change the special relationships between the government and potential for improving Indian education will be greater if jurisdiction for it lies with a department whose sole purpose is education.

The bill creates an office within the Department of Education solely devoted to improving Indian education headed by an Assistant Secretary. In addition, the committee expects and urges that that Assistant Secretary be of Indian, Alaska Native, or Aleutian origin.

The bill directs the Secretary of Education and the Assistant Secretary for Indian education to institute more local control of Indian education by the Indian people themselves. This is in keeping with our belief that primary policy responsibility for school should reside with the local community.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there are others who have indicated that they wished to speak. I see the Senator from Oklahoma is here.

I would just say again, as far as I am concerned it does little good to say that we submitted questionnaires to the Indian people and to say that we held hearings and asked them to come in and discuss a proposal made by the Federal Government.

The commitment was made to them that they would consulted before such a change would even be suggested. The promise was made to them that we would go to their councils and we would work with them to try to figure out what was the best course to take with regard to BIA schools and education programs and other Indian programs.

I find it very difficult and sad that I do not have the support of the Senator port for a Department of Education, that is, I think, it is like taking ROTC from the Department of Defense and turning it over to the Department of Education, that it makes no sense because these people are part of a whole community, an Indian community, as such. There is a different type of community in most places of the country than the non-Indian or native communities, and they work with problems all the way across the community, not only educational programs but the whole concept of the modernization and improvement of their way of life which is involved in their council operations. This takes it away from them at the very time they have achieved a degree of responsibility and control under acts we passed in this Congress just within the last 6 to 8 years. It takes away from them the very reasons for self-determination, and that is the control over the educational programs of their own children.

I think if we propose to do this for all of the unincorporated areas—let us just assume this was all the unincorporated areas of the United States, and the Federal Government came along and said, "We can do it better than the local people; let us put this in the Department of Education and manage their daily functions from Washington"—the reaction would be overwhelming. But that is exactly what this says. This is a local school responsibility, and the only reason it comes into the Federal Government at all is because of the Federal Government's prestige and responsibility to the Indian people. And the beneficiaries of that trust have demanded that the educational function stay with the BIA.

I hope the Senate will not let the Indian people down in this regard today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, will someone yield me time? I do not know how time is being allocated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no limitation on time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Fine.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield for a question?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is the Senator going to address himself to the Indian Affairs matter?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I would like to say to the Senator from Oklahoma and others concerned that there is a priority understanding with respect to the natural gas bill. If this matter can be concluded in 10 or 15 minutes, I see no particular problem with it. If not, I would raise the point, but I am certainly willing to stand back for 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if I may say so, the Senator from Oklahoma has been waiting, and if the Senator from Ohio will accord him the courtesy of listening to his remarks, I think it would be appropriate. There are other Senators programs and services administered and delivered for their benefit, the Indian people are probably just as perplexed as I am as to why in the face of overwhelmingly strong opposition to the transfer of Indian schools and education programs the proposal to transfer these activities to the new Department of Education was advanced by the administration at all.

When President Carter, on October 14, 1976, delivered his special message to American Indians, it was replete with assurances that Indian self-government will prevail in the administration's handling of the affairs of Indian people; that decisions affecting Indian tribes would be made in the tribal council rooms and not in Washington, D.C. A most impressive ending to that message must have been music to the ears of Indian people throughout the country, when the President stated:

> Finally, I will not take unilateral action on any issue regarding Indian affairs or Indian programs without full consultation with tribal representatives. Ours will be a Government of participation, of action, of program involvement, and of true self-government.

First I want to address myself to the first part, the Indian self-determination. Certainly it is true that the Bureau of Indian Affairs can be severely criticized for their inadequate and inept handling of Indian education. But I think by the same token the Bureau of Education of HEW can likewise be criticized for their inept handling of education.

There are many Indian students in our public school system. In fact, in Okla-

So, just at the time when we had told the Indians of this country that we want them to determine their own future, we then take away the opportunity for them to do that, as far as the very important area which their education is to them is concerned.

Education, of course, is most basic to the continuation, perpetuation, and instruction in their culture. By invading this very important area, I think we are guilty of breaking our word once again to the Indians. The President, through his action, is doing likewise. It reminds me of the letter to wrote to Governor Boren of Oklahoma concerning deregulation of natural gas, saying he was for it. This was 17 days before the election. But now he is for controls on natural gas. Here again is an example of his completely reversing himself, and this time to the Indian people.

I would say to the distinguished floor manager that it reminds me of when I was young, and we used to have cowboy and Indian games. I learned then about "Indian giving." I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from Connecticut has ever heard about Indian giving. But Indian giving, to me as a boy, was portrayed as Indians giving their word or giving something of tangible value to someone else, and then later taking it back.

I would like to say to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that that really is not Indian giving. I really found out as an adult, a few years later, what Indian giving is. I learned in at several who wish to speak also. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to time before the vote on this motion, of course; I would respect the Senator's wishes in that respect.

Mr. METZENBAUM. May I suggest that we accord the Senator from Oklahoma appropriate time?

Mr. STEVENS. Such time as he may wish, and then afterwards set this aside with the consent of the chairman. That is the understanding, that the energy bill comes first. I know Senator GOLDWATER wishes to be heard, and other Senators have indicated that they wish to be heard, but they are not present.

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is satisfactory.

Mr. STEVENS. However, first I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BARTLETT. I certainly understand the request of the Senator from Ohio, and I will be fairly brief.

Mr. President, the Indian people throughout this country have every reason to expect this Congress to adopt Senator STEVENS' amendment. Having received in 1975—just 3 years ago—through enactment of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, this Congress expression of support for maximum Indian participation in the policy-making decisions that affect their lives and well-being and in the direction of homa there are more Indian youngsters in our public school system than there are in the Indian schools. And I think that our public school system in Oklahoma ranks fairly well nationally.

But I would like to point out that the Johnson-O'Malley funds which are to be available in public schools for the special needs of Indians have not really been utilized effectively or efficiently for them and their needs.

One of their great needs is counseling. They have a different culture. They look upon competition in schools differently from the white students. They have special needs that have not been met in the public schools.

So, I do not see the reason for the great desire to move very quickly to transfer this to the Department of Education, and I presume to the public school system. I think that perhaps the public schools do offer a great opportunity for some Indian students, but only with adequate counseling and only with special consideration of Indian culture and Indian needs.

I am reminded by the apparent reverse action here—or at least the effort to reverse the action on Indian self-determination by the President and this committee to take away Indian education from the Indians themselves—that self-determination started the first effort among the Indians at having their own school boards, of having responsibility for the first time for their own educational system. Obviously, in 3 years you can only effect a beginning; you cannot very well adequately establish a real change in an education program.

Indian pow-wows which I attended. At these pow-wows, they quite often will pick out one or more people who are men or women to be honored by the tribe.

As they honor them, they have a special dance in which the honoree and his family make a parade and dance around the area. Then the men, in the several cases I saw, would stand in front of all the other Indians. The other Indians as they kept dancing, would bring gifts to him. These gifts could either be money or they could be blankets, various things of value, which they would place at the foot of the honoree.

Then as the gift giving part was finished, the honoree would pick up the gifts. Then he would dance around the dancing area and he would give these out. He would give these gifts, money, blankets, and other things of value, to the older people, to the obviously poorer people, and those who would have need for either the money or the gifts.

This is Indian giving. It is the kind of giving I think we should emulate rather than the kind of Indian giving that we have thought for so long was really Indian giving, which is white man giving. It is the white man saying, "Yes, we will recognize Indian self-determination, but for now we are not going to give the chance to the Indians to develop their Indian committees on education, to do the job they know needs to be done."

The record clearly shows that 90 to 95 percent of the federally recognized tribes and Indian interest organizations oppose this transfer. They list a number of reasons for their objections.

Although the Governmental Affairs Committee made an effort to address these objections in the bill, it is obviously still not satisfactory to Indian tribes as the mail, telephone calls, and office visits continue to call attention to Indian opposition to the transfer.

Mr. President, I have a rather lengthy speech which quotes many of the reactions of Indian tribes throughout the country to the proposed transfer, which indicates just how strongly they feel about this matter, and lists major reasons why the transfer should not take place, reasons that are based on the Indians' experience in dealing with the Federal Government for many, many years.

To me, their reasons make sense and are clearly reason enough to let the Indian schools and education programs remain where they presently are, at the focal point of Indian activity in the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

I ask unanimous consent that my speech be made a part of the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BARTLETT. I think possibly the Colorado River Indian Tribe in Arizona hit the nail on the head in its response to the question of transferring education programs to the new department, when they stated:

> It is not a new department that is needed but implementation of the promises, goals, and objectives that have been expressed in the past.

absolutely nothing about them. BIA does have a lot of knowledge.

I do think we are on the right track in dealing with the self-determination bill which gives primary responsibility to the Indians, which gives them the opportunity of devising a sensible program.

I earnestly urge my colleagues to oppose this provision in the bill, to support the Stevens amendment, and to make sure that the Indians are going to be dealt with squarely, and with justice.

EXHIBIT 1

STATEMENT BY MR. BARTLETT

I rise today in support of Senator Stevens' amendment to S. 991, the Department of Education Organization Act of 1978.

I oppose the transfer of BIA schools and education programs to the proposed Department of Education for many of the same reasons the vast majority of Indian people and Indian interest organizations do.

During the 93rd Congress, I actively supported the enactment of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act which was designed to provide maximum Indian participation in matters affecting Indian people and Indian lives. In enacting this Legislation in 1975, Congress declared policy in part with the following words:

"The Congress hereby recognizes the obligation of the United States to respond to the strong expression of the Indian people for self-determination by assuring maximum Indian participation in the direction of educational as well as other Federal services to Indian communities so as to render such services more responsive to the needs and desires of those communities."

Approximately one year later on October 14, 1976, President Carter delivered a spe-out of the BIA, Department of the Interior, to the proposed Department of Education."

The Shoshone-Bannock Tribe of Idaho: "We are convinced that, regardless of any assurance to the contrary, to place our BIA and tribal schools in such a Department would lead to public school control of everything. We oppose very strongly any attempt to erode the basic structure, however gradual, of the current system."

Colorado River Indian Tribes of Arizona: "After all the years it has taken the Bureau of Indian Affairs to understand the operation of government schools for our youth, it would take much longer and more to orient a new Department. It is not a new department that is needed but implementation of the promises, goals, and objectives that have been expressed in the past."

Red Cliff Band of Lake Superior Chippewa of Wisconsin: "Our tribe and many others believe that the BIA has not been perfect in the past, but through years of struggle, turmoil, and negotiation, we have gotten the BIA in a place where they are finally acting as the advocate and trust agency it was intended to be. We urge you to leave BIA education programs in the Indian Bureau where we have guarantees of improved quality education programs while we have major unresolved issues with USOE. . . ."

Lac Courte Oreille Tribal Governing Board of Wisconsin: "We regard this proposed transfer as an effort to evade the trust responsibility and commitments of the Federal Government."

Mescalero Apache Tribe of New Mexico: "We strongly feel that the Federal Government has a distinct and unique relationship to Indian people and tribes through treaties, etc., and should not lose this identity by lumping us and our special needs in with all other programs concerning education, for fear of being lost in a giant maze of educational

Mr. President, my State has more Indian tribes than any other State, 37, and it has more Indians than any other State. All the tribes and all the responses I have received from my State have indicated their strong opposition to this transfer of Indian education to the new department.

Obviously, the new department will know very little about the special requirements and needs of Indian education. I would tell the distinguished floor manager it has been my experience in Oklahoma that this is a very unique need that the Indians have. They do not compete the same way. They are not as many white children, wanting to raise their hand to answer a question. They [illegible] not raise their hand when they think [illegible] of their friends does not know the answer. They do not want to show them up. So they do have a different culture, a very good one. It is one that we could imitate, if we would, in many regards.

I think we are getting ourselves into something here that the committee was not equipped to properly assess, nor was the President properly advised, nor would the Congress be acting in good faith to the Indians of this country if they continued this provision in the Education Act.

I introduced legislation on a new Department of Education some years ago, and I have a bill in now. So I am in favor of a new department. I think it is most important that we have it. But I am just as strongly opposed to the new department taking over the responsibilities of the Indians because they know cial message to American Indians that was replete with assurances that Indian self-government will prevail in the handling of the affairs of Indian people, that decisions affecting Indian tribes will be made in the Tribal Council rooms and not in Washington, D.C. The President ended his special message to the Indian people by stating that:

"Finally, I will not take unilateral action on any issue regarding Indian affairs or Indian programs without full consultation with tribal representatives. Ours will be a government of participation, of action, of program involvement, and of true self-government."

In view of the Congress' declared policy in enacting the Self-Determination Act and the President's pronounncements that true-government will prevail in deciding Indian issues, I find it difficult to understand how the Administration and the Governmental Affairs Committee on July 11, ignored the expressed wishes of the vast majority of recognized Indian tribes and took action to transfer the BIA schools and education programs to the new Department of Education.

The Committee report on this action states that comments and input were actively solicited from more than 350 tribes and organizations across the country, but the report does not speak to the results of that solicitation. If I may, Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues some of the responses the Committee received from recognized tribal governing bodies and Indian interest organizations across the country. These comments represent the views of the vast majority of Indian tribes contacted who are served by the schools and education programs the Committee wishes to transfer.

From the National Tribal Chairmen's Association, National Congress of American Indians, and the Alaska Federation of Natives, all organizations that represent the federally recognized tribes in the United States the response was "an emphatic and uncompromising no to the transfer of Indian education gobbledygook . . . We do not favor transferring the operational and policy responsibility of the Bureau of Indian Affairs schools to such a department as the trend to more local Indian control of these schools needs to continue rather than be relinquished."

Comanche Indian Tribe of Oklahoma: "The concept of including those educational functions now assigned to the Assistant Secretary of Interior for Indian Affairs in a new Department of Education would not result in any improvement in Indian education systems. The transfer of the BIA-run school system to the Department of Education would lead to total elimination of schools separately established and identified for Indians."

The views of the Comance Tribe are representative of responses my office received from other tribes in my State of Oklahoma. The United Tribes of Western Oklahoma and Kansas comprising a total of 23 tribes—21 Oklahoma tribes and 2 Kansas tribes and representing more than 55,000 Indian members—are "unanimously opposed to the transfer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs education programs and services to the proposed Department of Education." I could go on and on with responses from Federally recognized tribes that oppose this transfer. It is clear to me that 90 to 95 percent of the Federally recognized tribes and Indian interest organizations throughout the country do not want Indian education programs moved to the proposed new department. To proceed with this action, which certainly runs counter to the desires of the Indian people, is not in line with either the declared policy of Congress in enacting the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act or the President's pronouncements that true self-government will prevail in Indian affairs matters.

Indian tribes must have a focal point, an agency with which to deal on all matters relating to Indians. Despite its management and organizational problems the BIA remains the focal point for the tribes and has an understanding of the magnitude of the problems. To separate this trust obligation from the lead agency charged with administering the trust responsibility to American Indians is the beginning of the end of the trust and would diminish the agency's advocacy role to a level of ineffectiveness. One of the reasons President Carter gave for not including transfer of Veteran's Education Programs to the new Department is that he was committed to one-stop shopping for Veterans. That same one-stop commitment is equally appropriate for Indians as it is for veterans. By placing Indian education programs in the new Department, Indian tribes will be forced to compete with larger, more powerful constituent groups. Experience has shown that when an Indian program is begun by another department or agency that has no long range goal in Indian affairs or little sensitivity to the desires of Indian people, Indians are just another disadvantaged minority. Indians are not "just another" minority; Indians are the only minority with which the Federal Government has a long-standing unique legal and historical relationship. The problems are similar to other minorities; the relationship with the Federal Government is not. It will be difficult if not imposible for tribes to stand on an equal footing with outside special interest groups who will influence decision making within this new Department of Education. A good example of what happens to Indian programs in an agency with little or no experience in administering to Indian needs is the Department of Housing and Urban Development's efforts to provide safe, decent and sanitary housing for Indian and Alaska Natives.

There is no assurance that improvements in Indian education will be achieved any ... stroy the only true advocacy agency for Indian people existing in our governmental structure.

Mr. President, in view of the detrimental effect removal of this major function from the Bureau of Indian Affairs will have on the agency and the Indians' faith in their trustee, the Federal Government, I ask my colleagues to support Senator Stevens' amendment so Indian tribes will know that at least some of us listen to what they have to say and believe it is they who know what is best for their well-being.

NATURAL GAS POLICY ACT

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that David Johnson, of Senator Muskie's staff, be granted the privileges of the floor in connection with the debate on the natural gas conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Anderson). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, did my good friend from Montana wish me to yield? I wanted to have a colloquy with the Senator from Connecticut about this amendment. The energy conference report does take priority. We are prepared, with the majority leader's consent, to enter into an agreement that there be 40 minutes on each side on my amendment and the amendment would come up following the disposition of the energy bill on Wednesday, the 27th, if that would meet with the approval of the

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> The Senator from Montana (Mr. Melcher) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1842.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

> On page 54, immediately after the period on line 11, insert the following: "The Secretary, through the Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education, shall also provide a unified approach to rural family education through the coordination of programs within the Department and shall work with the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to coordinate related activities and programs of other Federal departments and agencies.".

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the amendment I am offering today to S. 991 does not create any new Federal programs. What it does, is give to the planned Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education the specific authority to coordinate existing educational programs scattered throughout the new Department of Education and work with the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to coordinate support functions located in related Federal agencies, into a unified family education approach to better serve the needs of our faster or to any greater degree by placing it in a new structure than can be achieved in its present location. Historically USOE has given little or poor service to Indian education programs, which attests to the USOE's lack of commitment and understanding of tribal educational and social needs at the reservation level. USOE is a grant-oriented agency without even a general background in providing services to Indian tribes and communities, and I can see no advantage to placing Indian education programs in this setting. Surely the transfer is not considered necessary if the programs are to be funded and managed adequately. There is no convincing explanation as to why Indian programs can only be adequately funded and managed if removed from the BIA.

Most importantly, the true goal of Indian self-determination cannot be achieved with the transfer of Indian education. Indian people are striving for self sufficiency and control over all aspects of their lives; education is the method of attaining these goals, but such cannot be achieved if education occurs in a social, political, or economic vacuum. Indian people must have a part in directing Indian education policies and emphasis must follow if they are to see the concepts of self-determination come to fruition.

Indian opposition to this transfer is based on many years experience in dealing with the Federal Government. The apparent determination of the Administration to proceed with the transfer despite the wishes of the vast majority of Indian tribes indicates that, in an effort to provide an organizationally-efficient government, the Carter Administration is signaling an end to the BIA and fragmentation of all of the functions housed therein. To remove Indian education programs from the BIA which represents approximately two-thirds of the employees and approximately one-third of the budget, would reduce the Bureau's stature in the Department of Interior which the Indian people have worked many years to achieve and de-

Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I just cannot see that far down the road beyond the disposition of the conference report at the moment.

Mr. STEVENS. May we enter into the 40 minutes on each side?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Subject to the chairman's request, I would be agreeable to that.

Mr. RIBICOFF. That is agreeable to the manager of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Montana.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield, I ask unanimous consent that Chris Palmer of my staff be granted the privileges of the floor during the consideration of the pending legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1842

(Purpose: To provide for a unified approach to rural family education)

Mr. MELCHER. In light of the unanimous-consent agreement on the Stevens amendment, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to present an amendment at this time on the education bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

Nation's rural economically disadvantaged families.

For many years now, those of us representing States with large rural constituencies have been aware that most of the Federal programs that have been created to break the cycle of structural poverty in the United States have been of little benefit to the rural poor. The nature of the problem lies not in the substance of the programs, but in the nature of their delivery. Authority for administering the programs is divided up, bureaucratically, with very little coordination at the point of delivery. One office concentrates on vocational and occupational education, another on education for home management, another on adult basic education, another on special education for children, yet another on health education, and so on down the line. Such fragmentation has been possible in dealing with urban populations, because of the close geographical proximity of the families that take part—although even here I think many of our planners are beginning to realize that without better overall coordination the result is unnecessary overlap of some programs and gaps between others. This reduces the beneficial impact on the families that take part, and leads to waste and inefficiency.

But what is an inconvenience in an urban setting becomes an insurmountable difficulty in rural areas. For example, in Montana vocational educational schools are often hundreds or more miles apart, as are adult education centers, counseling centers, child development centers, career education centers, and so on. More important it seems never to be the same hundred miles. Often our rural disadvantaged do not even have the ability to seek out and find help when the services are so fragmented and geographically scattered. These problems are not unique to Montana. I am sure they exist throughout much of rural America, and they require attention if we are not to continue to discriminate against our rural families.

In Montana, we have tried to meet some of the needs of rural disadvantaged families in our State, as well as North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Nebraska, and Idaho, by providing an integrated family education program in a residential setting. The key concept which governs this approach is that the families are brought together in a residential setting, and a broad range of educational and supporting services are provided—treating the entire family as a unit. The families, recruited from within the six-State region, take up residence in existing facilities on what used to be Glasgow Air Force Base near Glasgow, Montana. They reside there for approximately 9 months while they take part in an educational program designed to meet the needs of the entire family. This includes vocational education and career education for the head of household (and sometimes the spouse as well), education in home management and parental responsibility, consumer education, basic adult education, elementary and secondary education, health education, and special education programs when needed. As you can see from this > Government policy should be aimed at strengthening and supporting the family as our most vital and enduring social resource.

The President proclaimed that—

This is a laudable goal and I wholly support it. However, I do not think that we must or should wait until 1981, or after, to take the first step to see that our disadvantaged rural families have full access to the kinds of educational services that can help to improve all facets of their life. The Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education is the right place to coordinate a family educational approach. The Government Affairs Committee's report states that a major mission of the Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education is to coordinate a "blend" of programs that will "improve the quality of life and coordinate education and work programs" for the American people. I believe that part of this mission should be to give the Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education the authority to assist in meeting the needs of the rural family as a unit, and to coordinate efforts from all sectors of the Department of Education, and other related agencies, to accomplish this goal.

My amendment is a modest request, in light of the dozens of programs and some $17 billion of authority to be assigned to the new Department of Education—however, it is vitally important to thousands of rural families that may be helped by better coordination at the Federal level. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

"(c) The Secretary may not alter, consolidate or discontinue the Office of Career Education, or reallocate the functions vested in such Office by the Career Education Incentive Act, Section 406 of the Education Amendments of 1974, or any other statute prior to October 1, 1983 unless (A) funds are not appropriated to carry out the provisions of such Act for any fiscal year preceding such date and (B) a period of ninety days has passed after the receipt by the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsection and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of the proposed action. After October 1, 1983 such Office shall not be altered, consolidated or discontinued, or its functions reallocated unless a period of ninety days has passed after the receipt by the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action list we offer the student families the entire range of educational services to be included in the new Department of Education. Central to this entire approach is the concentration of services and the focus on the entire family as a productive and mutually supportive unit.

The program has, we believe, been very successful on the limited level that we have been able to maintain it, without the support of a coordinated Federal effort. It is an approach which goes beyond the traditional concept of "job training." In treating the educational needs of the entire family together in a residential setting, it represents an effective way to not only improve employability, but also increase the standard of living and participation in the community for disadvantaged families.

The viability of this approach has long been recognized by those in close contact with it. It has received strong support during its 6 years of existence from the Governors of the region, the congressional members of the six States, the regional governmental councils, the agencies within the region, and most important of all from the student families who participate.

This approach has also begun to gain national recognition. President Carter has called for more attention to the development of a sound American family. In announcing the White House Conference on Families to be convened in Washington during 1981, he stated that—

> The main purpose of the Conference will be to examine the strengths of American family life, the difficulties faced, and the ways in which family life is affected by public policies.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Melcher amendment is acceptable to the manager of the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. PERCY. It is acceptable as far as I know. I know of no objection on this side.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senators and I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1643

(Purpose: To insure that the Department of Education carries out Career Education programs consistent with the structure of Public Law 95-207)

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY) I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated. It is in behalf of the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF) on behalf of himself and Mr. HATHAWAY proposes unprinted amendment No. 1643:
> On page 50, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following:
> "(4) administration of programs pertaining to career education;".
> On pages 50, 51 and 52, redesignate "(6)", "(7)", "(8)", "(9)", "(10)", "(11)", "(12)", "(13)", "(14)", "(15)", and "(16)" as "(7)", "(8)", "(9)", "(10)", "(11)", "(12)", "(13)", "(14)", "(15)", "(16)" and "(17)", respectively.
> proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsecion and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of the proposed action.".
> On page 87, line 1, strike out "(c)" and insert "(d)".

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, the intention of this amendment is to insure that the new Department of Education carries out the purpose of the Career Education Incentive Act consistent with the structure envisioned by Congress in enacting that legislation, which was signed into law on December 13, 1977.

The amendment would require that for the next 5 fiscal years the Office of Career Education could not be discontinued or consolidated unless for any year Congress failed to appropriate funds to carry out the purposes of that act and unless the conditions already established in section 413 of the committee bill were complied with. Those conditions allow discontinuation or alteration of a number of statutorily created offices if a period of 90 days has passed after notification to the Senate Committee on Human Resources and the House Committee on Education and Labor, including a complete justification for the rationale behind the reorganization.

This aspect of my amendment thus provides for a limited exception to the reorganization provisions contained in the committee's bill. But, for reasons I shall explain, I believe this exception is vitally needed if Congress clearly expressed goals regarding career education are to be fulfilled.

The amendment also would include administration career education programs in the functions of the Department listed in section 203 of the bill, and would explicitly include the carrying out of the Career Education Incentive Act in the transferred functions listed in section 301 of the bill.

Together, these changes will insure that the 5-year career education program so recently enacted by Congress will receive appropriate, focused attention in the new department.

The Career Education Incentive Act was intended by Congress to instill career education concepts into the elementary and secondary levels over a 5-year period of time. At the conclusion of this time period, all Federal funding would cease. Consistent with this, the act provides authorizations of $50 million in fiscal year 1979, $100 million in fiscal year 1980 and fiscal year 1981, $50 million in fiscal year 1982 and $25 million in fiscal year 1983. Concurrent with these bell-shaped authorizations, the required non-Federal share of the part of State and local education agencies gradually increases over the same period, from no match required in fiscal year 1979 and 1980, to 25 percent in fiscal year 1981, 50 percent in fiscal year 1982 and 75 percent in fiscal year 1983. In this way, when Federal expenditures cease, the State and local education agencies will be in a position to undertake the entire burden.

This unusual, built-in sunset feature will require a smoothly functioning administrative structure for career education at the Federal level. Further, because career education by its very nature integrates basic educational skills, specific job skills, and knowledge of available year under the act, Congress will provide between $22.5 and $25 million for elementary and secondary career education formula grants, despite administration opposition.

Despite the requirements of section 431 of the General Education Provisions Act, regulations have yet to be published in the Federal Register, a full 9 months after the bill was signed, and 1 month after the final deadline.

For all of these reasons it is necessary to incorporate into the legislation establishing this new Department of Education explicit provisions preserving the programmatic integrity of career education.

Mr. President, I appreciate very much that the distinguished Senator from Connecticut offered this amendment on my behalf. I did just arrive back from Maine and I am prepared to offer the amendment myself.

This would simply exempt the Career Education Office from the reorganization provisions of the bill, which would otherwise provide that the Secretary may abolish any one of 10 offices including the Career Education Office after 90 days of consultation with the House and Senate committees. Since the Career Education Act is only a 5-year bill, I thought it would be better to allow this office to be abolished only if Congress did not appropriate any money for that.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, the amendment has a good purpose and is acceptable to the manager of the bill.

> So many offices and institutions deal with education in the federal government, that speaking about an education policy is mere wishful thinking. Yet, even though education is left to the states in our system, this lack of coherent education policy on the federal level has caused an undue burden on state and local authorities. Much of this burden stems from a fragmenting of federal education decision and policy making. It is caused by a duplication and reduplication of requirements on local education authorities.

The Department of Education Act, S. 991, correctly emphasizes the primary role that State and local governments have in the education of our children. This local control is essential and is the backbone of our public school system.

But the Federal Government must be prepared to meet its obligations in assisting the States. We must realize that State and local governments are reaching the breaking point in their ability to raise revenues for public schools, and we must be prepared to provide imaginative leadership in this critical period for education. Federal assistance must be maintained at an adequate level and our efforts must be well-coordinated. A fragmented HEW can no longer offer the necessary leadership.

A Department of Education in the Cabinet will allow us to consolidate and coordinate efforts at the Federal level. At the same time, by eliminating overlapping and conflicting jurisdictions, we can save the State and local governments time and money, we can cut paperwork, avoid duplication, and give able job opportunities and requirements, it is essential that coordination of all relevant Federal programs and policies be carried out.

With this in mind, the Career Education Incentive Act requires that administration at the Federal level be undertaken by the Office of Career Education, established within the Office of the Commissioner of Education by the Education Amendments of 1974. Under this organizational structure, the relevant elements of all appropriate Federal educational programs can be focused to achieve the goals of career education. Equally important, States and local educational agencies can look to one location for assistance in carrying out their career education plans. Under the new bill this office must continue to exist within the office of the Secretary and its functions must be continued lest the will of Congress and the needs of the States be frustrated.

At this point in time it is especially important that we underline our commitment to the importance of career education and that we insure its continued integrity in the new department.

I am fearful that unless these amendments are incorporated into the pending bill, the administration will attempt to submerge career education in the interstices of a disinterested bureaucracy as part of a conscious effort to impede its progress rather than carrying out the law as enacted by Congress.

The Career Education Incentive Act was passed overwhelmingly by Congress in spite of administration opposition. For fiscal year 1979, the first program

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, there is no objections on the minority side. The amendment is acceptable.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I thank the Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the legislation we are considering today is a long-needed step in improving our Nation's Federal education policy.

For many years, the education experts in Congress and across the country have stressed the need to remove the education programs from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and establish a separate Department of Education in the Cabinet. And in my campaign for the Senate and since the beginning of my term, I have witnessed almost unprecedented support in my State of Tennessee for a Department of Education.

This bill, Mr. President, has my unqualified support.

I wish to commend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, the distinguished floor manager of S. 991, Senator Ribicoff, for his tireless efforts in behalf of this bill. He is a friend of the education community and, without his leadership, we would not have a Department of Education bill before the Senate today.

Mr. President, one of our Nation's most eloquent spokesmen for education was our late colleague, Hubert Humphrey. In considering this historic legislation today, it is wise to recall Senator Humphrey's testimony to the Governmental Affairs Committee last year:

greater emphasis to those areas where Federal involvement is needed. I was particularly impressed by the endorsement of S. 991 by Dr. Sam H. Ingram, the commissioner of the Tennessee Department of Education. Dr. Ingram believes that having a single Department of Education in the Cabinet will improve the ability of each State to carry out its education policies in a unified, comprehensive manner.

Teh current Federal approach to education is fragmented and only adds to the problem instead of the solution. Public education remains one of the most important services that Government can provide for its citizens. It is, literally, an investment by each generation in the success of the next. A Department of Education is essential to keeping that promise. A Department of Education will give us the most bang for each education buck. It is a sensible and long-needed bill, and I urge its passage.●

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is the Senator from Connecticut prepared to yield the floor?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I have no choice. Other people want recognition, but the Senator from Ohio has been most indulgent. I personally do not dare, have the temerity, to ask for any more requests. It is up to the Senator from Ohio and other Members on the floor.

Mr. PERCY. I have just one remaining piece of business, Mr. President. I send to the desk a modification to my amendment 3409 and ask that it be printed in the Record at this time.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 95th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Vol. 124 WASHINGTON, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1978 No. 147

Senate

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 16, 1978)

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous-consent, now within the framework of the unanimous-consent agreement on the natural gas bill, that and challenges include: A decline in student achievement and in the public confidence in the quality of education, unacceptably high rates of high school Education is one of the Nation's largest businesses. Upwards of 65 million Americans are directly involved in education. Education is the Nation's second largest the Senate resume consideration of Calendar Order No. 1000, S. 991.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 991) to establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I welcome this opportunity to strongly urge my colleagues here in the Senate to give favorable consideration to the creation of a Cabinet-level Department of Education as part of the Federal reorganization of education functions.

The time for fundamental improvement of our broad educational system is now. While education will always be an area of American life in which local, State and private influence is predominant, there is a need for improving the Federal educational services designed to help overcome the major problems and difficult challenges facing our educational systems. Some of these problems dropouts and unemployed youth, and the isolation of educational institutions from family life and community services. I firmly believe that the establishment of a Department of Education will enable the Federal Government to effectively assist State, local, and private agencies to achieve higher standards of quality and to maximize existing Federal resources to serve special needs children and assure a wider degree of parent participation in the educational process.

Education is far too important to be scattered piecemeal among various governmental departments and agencies which are too often busy with other, sometimes dominant, concerns. Too often, State and local educational administrators, our constituents, go from agency to agency, piecing together a package of grants and approvals. They are continually snarled in the red-tape of Federal regulations, reporting requirements and the duplication of efforts. Finally, this is not only a waste of time, it is time taken away from the education of our Nation's children.

The result of our present system means that we have no effective Federal management. A Secretary of Education would convey to the American people and to the officials of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Federal and State governments the importance that we as a nation place on education. But more importantly, consolidating education functions will provide a more efficient mechanism for the coordination of the numerous programs in a sensible, workable and effective framework.

fiscal commitment. What the schools do shapes society for generations.

The establishment of a Cabinet-level Department will improve the Federal Government's capacity to support the States and local communities in their efforts to provide an equal chance for quality education to all our citizens. This bill has my strong support, and I look forward to successful completion of this legislation at the earliest possible time.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3409 (AS MODIFIED)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President I call up amendment No. 3409 (as modified) and ask for its consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report. Will the Senator please send the amendment to the desk. The clerk does not have the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska (Mr. Stevens), for Mr. Percy, Mr. Talmadge, Mr. McGovern, Mr. Dole, Mr. Abourezk, Mrs. Allen, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Baker, Mr. Bartlett, Mr. Bellmon, Mr. Bentsen, Mr. Brooke, Mr. Burdick, Mr. Cannon, Mr. Case, Mr. Chiles, Mr. Church, Mr. Clark, Mr. Cranston, Mr. Culver, Mr. Curtis, Mr. Danforth, Mr. Eagleton, Mr. Eastland, Mr. Ford, Mr. Goldwater, Mr. Hansen, Mr. Haskell, Mr. Paul G. half of low-income plaintiffs, resulted in the establishment of school lunch programs in Hartford, Connecticut; Bridgeport, Connecticut; Mount Vernon, New York; Cleveland, Ohio; and the State of Rhode Island, among others. In many of these areas, litigation would not have been required if state and local Boards of Education and education administrators had viewed the school food prgrams as integral parts of an educational environment."

FRACs testimony continues—

"In short, in the past, poor people have not been able to look to education administrators and policy makers to spearhead the need for school food programs. Instead, these administrators have often taken the position that such programs are expensive, administratively burdensome, and must take a distant backseat to other education priorities."

In addition to FRAC's testimony, The Children's Foundation testified that "it is completing a study on barriers to the implementation of the school breakfast program. The study is entitled "I'd Rather Go to Hell Than Run a Breakfast Program." This was the direct quote of a local school official. It is indicative of the view that many such officials have of these programs.

Second, the transfer will jeopardize the funding of the child nutrition programs. Since educators have not generally viewed nutrition programs as a vital part of the educational process, it is reasonable to assume that a Federal Department of Education would be no more responsive to the importance of such programs. When faced with budgetary constraints, these programs will be seen as expandable. This would be particularly true of those child nutrition programs with little or no connection to school systems, such as the summer food and day care feeding programs.

Third, USDA would still keep the research support vital to these programs. USDA is

Mr. STEVENS. Senator Percy has asked me to call up his amendment. The purpose of his amendment would be to strike the proposed transfer of the child nutrition programs. He has outlined to the committee a number of sound reasons for keeping these programs in the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement that Senator Percy would have made in support of his amendment if he were here be printed in the Record.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Statement of Senator Percy

My amendment would strike the proposed transfer of the child nutrition programs. There are a number of sound reasons for keeping these programs in USDA.

First, a Department of Education will, as it should be, be dominated by educators. Educators have had a history of not placing high priority on the placement of these programs within the schools. In testimony received by the Committee, the Food Research and Action Center, a non-profit anti-hunger advocacy center, stated that—

"A good portion of our effort has been in the area of School Lunch and School Breakfast Program expansion. Time after time we have found that state and local Boards of Education have been at best uninterested, and at worst obstructionists, in this expansion effort. FRAC and/or Legal Services attorneys have brought numerous lawsuits seeking to expand school lunch programs in local areas. These lawsuits, brought on be-increasing its research in both nutrition and agricultural economics. It would be counterproductive to remove the child nutrition programs from a Department that is presently equipped to do research in areas directly related to the improvement of these programs.

Fourth, although the Administration has pledged its continued support for the commodities aspect of these programs, this guarantee may become worthless several years down the road as the programs become dominated by educators. Moreover, we must not lose sight of one of the original reasons behind the creation of the school lunch program, which was commodity support. Instead of paying farmers not to grow crops, we are paying them for their surplus crops and using those surplus crops to feed undernourished children. This is a much more efficient use of taxpayers' money. As Senator Talmadge brought to our attention, "The school lunch program today constitutes the only effective means through which the Secretary of Agriculture can provide price and market stability to those farm commodities that do not enjoy the protection of government price support programs."

Fifth, one approach to improving the quality of meals in these programs requires training food service personnel to procure and prepare food more effectively and economically. USDA has the expertise to accomplish this and is initiating activities in this area. A Department of Education is less likely to attack such a problem or to have the expertise to do so effectively.

Sixth, the transfer is opposed by a broad spectrum of groups, including agriculture groups, child-oriented public interest groups, nutritionists, and school food administrators. This grouping includes the American School Food Service Association, which is the largest national association representing people who direct, manage, and work in school nutrition programs at the State and local level. These groups have worked the closest with and are the most knowledgeable on the child nutrition programs.

Seventh, the President's Reorganization Project is presently conducting a study of the Federal nutrition effort. This study is not scheduled to be completed until next year. As a result, the transfer of these programs at this time would be premature.

Regarding nutrition education, I would again like to quote one of our witnesses, Mr. Hendrik Wentink of the Poultry and Egg Institute of America. He states:

". . . while nutrition education historically has nowhere received the emphasis it has deserved, it cannot be disputed that the USDA is exerting aggressive leadership in the area today. Secretary Bergland has formed a Human Nutrition Policy Committee to coordinate all USDA nutrition programs including food assistance, safety, quality research and education. Interim regulations to implement nutrition education grants to the states under the 1977 Child Nutrition Act amendments have been promulgated. The Department is conducting a novel nutrition awareness project which will test out a multimedia approach for issuing and reinforcing nutrition messages. Authority under recent aemndments of the National School Lunch Act to prohibit the sale of "junk food" in participating schools is being invoked. The focus of Extension activities is being expanded to reach urban areas more effectively. The very substantial Expanded Food & Nutrition Program within the Extension Service is developing a special program to emphasize nutrition counseling for food stamp users. And these are far from all the fronts of the USDA's nutrition education campaign."

It has been stated that the best place for nutrition education is in the schools. I agree. energy policy demanded a new Department of Energy to coordinate and pull together all aspects of the problem, then we insist that the same principle applies to the development of a national food, nutrition, and agriculture policy. The nutrition programs should not be sent to other agencies or departments; indeed the food-related functions of other departments should be consolidated within the Department of Agriculture."

As I have shown, educators have a marked disinterest in nutrition education and in the school feeding programs. On the other hand, USDA has demonstrated great interest and enthusiasm. Transfer of these programs would not solve any problems, it would only create new ones. The child nutrition programs should and must remain in a broad-based Department of Agriculture.

SAVE THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment by my distinguished colleague from Illinois, Mr. PERCY. The child nutrition programs operated by this Government belong in, and should remain in, the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

All 18 members of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry endorse that concept. Fifty-nine Members of the Senate endorse that concept. The House Government Operations Committee endorses that concept. And one is finally led to wonder why we had to face this situation, when so few support the idea of transferring these programs to the new Department of Education?

The child nutrition programs are designed to achieve health, agricultural, and income maintenance objectives. The need to know how to purchase and prepare foods that contain proper nutrient levels, are appetizing, and are economical. To make progress toward these goals, school food service personnel need assistance in how to procure high quality food economically, how to process and prepare it, and how to store it so that nutrient values are retained.

School food personnel who are not skilled in procurement can end up with ground beef that has a high fat content, foods with high salt or sugar content, or other nutritional quality problems. In addition, schools can pay higher amounts than are necessary for food items.

To help school districts across the country do a better job is a major undertaking. The Department of Agriculture is taking on this task and has the necessary expertise to do so. A Department of Educaton is unlikely to have either the inclination or the expertise to get into this area.

In rural Georgia, a USDA expert has helped a nine-school district cooperative education service agency develop an integrated program of food procurement which allows school to purchase better food at a lower cost.

In Nashville, Tenn.; Fresno, Calif.; and southwestern Colorado; USDA specialists have acted as a catalyst in developing a system of direct purchases of fresh produce from local farmers. This has eliminated the extra charges of middlemen and improved the quality of the

But I also ask, if educators are so interested in nutrition education, why have they not instituted these programs in the schools? The answer, of course, is that they are not interested. In fact, they are so disinterested that they have actually promoted non-nutritious "junk foods" in the schools. In order to raise extra money, they have candy and soda machines in the schools. These junk food machines compete with the nutritious lunches served in the school cafeteria. Congress recognized this problem, a problem created by educators, last year when it mandated USDA to ban the sale of junk foods that compete with the school lunch program. USDA has responded to that mandate and that ban is going into effect this summer. How can we justify transfering these programs to a Department which will be dominated by such insensitive interests?

In conclusion, the question has been asked, "Where will these programs best operate and serve our nation's children?" The answer is that they will best operate and serve our children in USDA. As the former Ranking Minority Member of the Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, I have watched with great satisfaction the growth of the child nutrition programs. Due to the work of the Nutrition Committee, we have come to understand that it is vitally important that our food, nutrition and agricultural policies be coordinated. As Senator Talmadge stated in a letter to the Committee, co-signed by the entire Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry, USDA is the best place for achieving maximum coordination. In the letter, he states:

"GAO in a recent report on nutrition research, found 'a lack of central focus and coordination' to be the number one barrier to progress in the area. We feel certain that progress in evolving a food and agricultural policy is equally dependent on having a central focus. If the development of a national largest of these programs happen to operate primarily in the schools. The transfer of these programs to an education department seems to be predicated more on the fact that both child nutrition programs and traditional education programs are run through schools, than on potential benefits to child nutrition, education, or administration at any level of Government.

The legislative history of the National School Lunch Act of 1946 indicates that it was enacted to fulfill four objectives. Subsequent legislation expanding the program, or adding new programs, has reiterated the same objectives:

To safeguard the health and nutritional well-being of the Nation's children.

To provide a domestic outlet for commodities acquired through the Department's price support and surplus removal activities.

To promote good eating habits in children by exposing them to a variety of wholesome foods; and

To provide economic assistance to low income families.

Over the past year, the greatest single concern expressed about the child nutrition programs in the media has been the quality of meals served to children and the need to upgrade these meals. The very success or failure of the school food programs rest on the quality of meals.

When meals do not satisfy nutritional standards, or are thrown away rather than eaten, the basic purposes of the program are subverted and millions of dollars of Federal funds are wasted.

To serve quality school meals, schools food served to school children. These projects have also had significant nutrition education aspects, with farmers explaining food production in the classroom and children occasionally picking fresh produce at nearby farms. These projects show great future potential, and USDA is developing model projects for expansion. The projects help develop markets for family farmers at the same time that they improve lunches for children.

A primary reason why small, local food purchasers, such as school districts and hospitals, have had difficulty achieving the efficiency USDA has in large scale community operations is a lack of current price information and how to use that information.

Through the Market News Services of the Agricultural Marketing Service, USDA has been providing up-to-date price information to producers, processors, and wholesalers for years. Now, USDA has developed an information kit which explains to institutional food buyers how to take advantage of current price information to economize on food procurement. This project was a cooperative effort involving the Agricultural Marketing Service and the Food and Nutrition Service.

Another key area in child nutrition is the basic nutritional standards that USDA establishes for meals. These standards are based on nutrition research conducted by USDA's Science and Education Administration (SEA). The Department recently established a Human Nutrition Center within SEA as a focal point for research in this area.

The Food and Nutrition Service (FNS) works with SEA to design research that will provide information in determining the nutritional standards needed in these programs and to test specific proposals for alterations in meal patterns used in the programs.

Recently, FNS proposed the most major changes in the school lunch meal pattern since the passage of the National School Lunch Act in 1946. These proposals were based on several years of work by SEA. Plans are now in final stages for field tests in hundreds of schools of these and other changes in the meal patterns. USDA's Economics, Statistics, and Cooperatives Service (ESCS) is playing a major role in designing and developing these field tests, which will carefully analyze both economic and nutritional impacts of the proposed change.

In addition, SEA, FNS, and ESCS are also working together to mount major nutritional evaluations of the child nutrition programs. The National Food Consumption Survey, conducted by SEA, is collecting information on participation in child nutrition programs and its nutritional impact. SEA is now discussing plans with FNS and ESCS for a major, multiyear nutritional evaluation of the school lunch program, and has been provided funds by Congress for this purpose.

Elsewhere in SEA, the Human Nutrition Center is conducting research into such areas as the importance of trace minerals in the diets of children—research that is also vital to, and coordities purchased at market prices when surpluses have been exhausted.

USDA is able to serve a dual objective—both to support the agricultural economy and to provide nutritious food items to schools and other institutions that care for children.

Even during periods of surplus, USDA supplements the surpluses with purchases of other, nonsurplus commodities that schools need. Such a balanced approach would be difficult to work out with a split jurisdiction on which USDA procures and ships commodities but a Department of Education administers the programs where the commodities are used.

Two particular problems would be likely to arise as a result of a transfer. Housing these programs in a Department of Education could lead to an emphasis on providing more in the way of cash subsidies and less in commodities, with possible adverse effects on agricultural producers. At the same time, a transfer could lead to adverse effects on the types and variety of those commodities that would still be provided to schools.

There is now a balance in the Department's commodity purchase decisions between serving the needs of schools and moving surplus agricultural products.

The reason generally given for moving the child nutrition programs to a Department of Education is to facilitate educational administration at the State and local level. Upon close exami-trade-offs, Federal education administrators might sacrifice child nutrition efforts.

Successful food service is usually found in schools where administrators view the child nutrition programs as an integral part of the education program, while poor quality food service is frequently found in schools where child nutrition programs are viewed as ancillary to the education program.

Some States are contemplating the shifting of responsibility for the administration of such programs out of State education departments, and Texas has already announced plans for such a move.

Moving the child nutrition programs to a Department of Education would place the programs in an organization which is not concerned with the formulation or execution of nutrition policy; and second, it would whittle away at the total array of interests competing within the Department of Agriculture.

Overall, there is little real gain from moving child nutrition programs to an Education Department. There is risk of substantial loss, however, from such a move. The linkages with human nutrition research, food and consumer economics, agricultural impact studies, food specification writing, and food inspection in USDA would all be lost. Program operation and commodity purchases would be split, thus making the commodity operation more susceptible to pressures nated with, the operation of child nutrition programs.

Finally, to help assure that the best quality food is provided with the available resources, ESCS is now involved in 16 major studies concerning FNS food assistance programs. Most of these studies are concentrated in the child nutrition area. ESCS is now conducting studies on the proper level of both food and administrative reimbursements for the summer food program, and on related questions of food quality and food prices and profit margins by private vendors in the summer program.

ESCS has designed an array of studies on the nutritional, economic, administrative, and agricultural impacts of providing cash in lieu of commodities to school districts and is involved in the field tests of changes in school meal patterns. Most of these studies cut across several disciplines—from nutritional to agricultural economics—and it is not likely they could be adequately handled by a Department of Education.

In the foreseeable future, the Federal Government will come into possession of increasing stores of surplus agricultural commodities. A Department of Education would have no particular concern with the use of the child nutrition programs as a domestic outlet for surplus commodities.

The existence of agricultural stabilization and children nutrition programs within USDA permits the development of an integrated food and nutrition policy that used surpluses when they exist, and maintains the necessary framework for this function by providing commodination, this contention turns out to be weak.

Commodities would still come from USDA. States would have to deal with two Federal Departments in the operation of food service programs, not one.

The uniformity of Federal program requirements directed through Treasury and OMB circulars, plus integration that has already occurred between FNS and the Office of Education, means that little additional administrative simplification could take place. The particular records and administrative requirements in the child nutrition programs stem from the distinct reimbursement structures carefully constructed for these programs by Congress over the past 30 years. By and large, the same records would still have to be kept. They would simply be submitted by the State to a Department of Education rather than to USDA.

Transfer of these programs to an education department offers no significant opportunities for long-range reduction in administrative costs and burdens at Federal, State, or local levels.

The short-term disruption caused by transfer would be an added cost. Where opportunities exist for reducing administrative costs by integrating FNS and Office of Education activities, integration now takes place.

While a transfer would not accomplish much in the administrative area, it could seriously jeopardize the strength and well-being of the child nutrition programs.

Among educators, child nutrition programs are often perceived as an expendable service to education. Faced with budgetary constraints and the need for to act largely as a surplus removal operation.

The new Education Department would have little ability to work with States and school districts to buy more economically, to purchase cooperatively, to enter into direct marketing arrangements with farmers, or to make high quality nutritional purchases.

On February 28 of this year the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry unanimously reported to the Senate a simple resolution calling for the maintenance of a strong and independent Department of Agriculture.

A hold was placed on that resolution so that the Senate could not consider it.

I am not one to go about looking for conspiracies, but I am led to wonder whether there are not those in Congress and elsewhere who look forward to the demise of USDA through a whittling away of functions, using Federal reorganization and efficiency as an excuse.

While some attempt to take child nutrition away from the Department, others are making blatant and public attempts to steal the natural resource functions of USDA, partially through discrediting outstanding public servants, such as the Chief of the Forest Service, in the press.

Others having been moving stealthily to capture the rural development functions of the Department.

I can understand their avarice. Since I have been chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, I have always sought to make the USDA a broad-based Department that represents farmers, consumers, and city dwellers.

The USDA is conservatively operated.

its agencies rank among the best insofar as Federal employee productivity is concerned. Agriculture's share of the Federal budget has declined sharply over the past decade, to only about 3 percent of the Federal budget. Only $6 billion of the funds for the Department of Agriculture are for agricultural programs, while $8.6 billion are for food and nutrition programs. This means that just 1.2 percent of the 1978 Federal budget was earmarked for the support of agricultural programs.

I am not so much concerned about the declining share of the Federal budget for agriculture, because this decline is a tribute to agriculture's success in meeting its obligations.

My distinguished colleague from South Dakota, Mr. McGovern, made an outstanding statement about Federal reorganization as it impacts on the Department of Agriculture, on February 8 of this year, when he introduced, with Senator Dole, S. 2519. I ask that this statement be included in the Record at this point:

> It seems to me that it might be well to examine this reorganization process as it has been set up, to see what kinds of conclusions might be reached.
> First of all it has been established on a functional or incremental basis, which presumes that like kinds of activities ought to be lumped together so as to avoid duplication of effort.
> What concerns me about this presumption is that certain agencies are multifaceted in their activities. For instance, the Department of Agriculture manages and conserves of Transportation and the Department of Housing and Urban Development, then we have learned nothing. There remain large chunks of Government activity dealing with housing and transportation which remain outside the jurisdiction of both of these agencies, and that is why Senator McGovern's statement is so compelling.

The taxpayers are not telling us to move the organization boxes around in an exercise of managerial hokus-pokus. They want the Government to be leaner and more effective. They want it to spend less money and employ fewer people.

In transferring the child nutrition programs to an education department, the opportunities for reductions in cost or administrative burdens in accounting requirements are virtually nonexistent. The accounting manuals used at the local level for both FNS and Office of Education programs were developed by the same accounting firm, with the specific aim of making accounting procedures in both agencies' programs compatible. Differences in these accounting procedures reflect the differences between food service and other educational services. In addition, OMB Circular A-102 sets general standards on Federal accounting requirements for all Federal grain-in-aid programs.

Therefore, the proposal to move the nutrition programs will save the taxpayers not one thin dime, while the cost of the transfer will be substantial.

But, as I said, the piecemeal dismantling of USDA is the broader issue. I for ment which would control some 164 or so education programs scattered among the Government, with a budget of $17.5 billion and a staff of some 23,000 persons. This new Department would include the higher education programs outside DHEW's Education Division, the overseas Defense Department schools, the Bureau of Indian Affairs schools, and the USDA child nutrition and nutrition education programs. We are all too familiar with the major arguments for a new Department:

A new department would give education more budgetary clout.

A new Department would eliminate scattering of the over 300 education programs in some 40 Federal agencies, and provide the basis for a national educational policy.

A new Department would provide prestige to an educational entity that encompasses nearly one-third of the population as either students, teachers, or administrators and who deserve representation at the cabinet level.

Of course the justification for the transfer of the child nutrition programs is that they would bring a $3 billion budget base to this new Department.

The merits of a new Department of Education were never the issue with the Senate Agriculture Committee. However, we have gone on record on more than one occasion to oppose the transfer of the child nutrition programs, including the training and nutrition education support services.

national forest lands. This management is tied intimately to national wood and fiber policy on private lands. Most of the private forest lands are held by farmers, whose land is also the base from which we get our food. These private lands are protected through the policies of the Soil Conservation Service. Farm income is protected by the Farmers Home Administration and the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, as well as other USDA agencies. Various shifts in farm and forestry economies, such as the pitifully low prices farmers are now receiving, having a decided impact on the economies of rural towns, which leads naturally into the department's rural development efforts.

Like the facets on a diamond ring, these functions are irrevocably tied together into a related package of Federal efforts that serve rural America.

The second question that a functional approach to reorganization raises is the desirability of competition between agencies. General Motors, which I think we will agree has had some business success, is organized along competitive lines. The Oldsmobile Division competes with the Buick Division, which competes with the Chevrolet Division, for customers of automobiles. This organizational success, and others like it, would seem to indicate that—while there is a definite need to streamline the Government and eliminate excessive overlap of functions—there is something to be said for having agencies compete with one another. A merging of agencies on a purely functional basis could certainly lead to departmental complacency and bureaucratic laxity. If you have the only store in town, it is easy to forget about customer service.

There is no way to make successful a functional reorganization of the Government; if we have not learned that, as a result of the creation of the Department one do not intend to sit idly by while this raid on USDA is being conducted by people who do not even know how to spell "farm." I am appalled that certain persons in the executive branch and Congress are literally falling all over themselves to see how many functions they can yank out of USDA.

Mr. President, I call on my colleagues in the Senate to vote for the Percy amendment. I call on my colleagues to save the Department of Agriculture.

CHILD NUTRITION PROGRAMS AND NEW DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today a bill to establish a new Department of Education (S. 991) has come to the floor, calling for reorganizing a number of existing Federal programs to form a basis for this new Department. The idea of Government reorganization is not new: The record shows that nearly 100 reorganization plans affecting some 240 departments and agencies were submitted by Presidents between 1939 and 1968.

The idea of stripping the child nutrition programs from the Department of Agriculture to provide a basis for this reorganization is new, however. As one of the early cosponsors of Senator PERCY's amendment to oppose this transfer, I would like to say a few words in support of the courageous stand taken by the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

A BIT OF HISTORY

We are all quite familiar with ths issue, but a bit of recent history is in order. Last April 14 the President asked Congress to create a Cabinet-level Depart-

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE OPPOSES TRANSFER

Mr. President, on several earlier occasions I joined with the other 17 Members of the Senate Agriculture Committee and denounced the child nutrition transfer proposal. We held many serious reservations about such a move:

First, why education at this time? Why not wait until Congress is ready to overhaul the health and welfare programs?

Second, why strip the child nutrition programs from agriculture at a time when it is becoming increasingly clear that food, agriculture and nutrition are interrelated? As ranking minority member of the Senate Nutrition Subcommittee I am more and more convinced that agriculture and nutrition must be brought into closer coordination.

Third, why pull school meals from the several basic components of the Department of Agriculture which have contributed to their development and expansion; such as the wholesome agricultural products of the commodity distribution program, our national land-grant system of education and research assistance, the human nutrition research laboratories, and of course the nutrition information and education services? All these key elements of the Department have been instrumental in the advancement of school meals since the inception of the National School Lunch Act of 1946.

Fourth, why interrupt our efforts toward policy development? We cannot successfully develop a new food, farm, and nutrition policy with programs fragmented all over the executive branch of Government.

Fifth, why cut back on USDA's broad base? The scope of the Department of Agriculture must remain broad and diversified if the Department is to serve its constituents better.

Next, why be shortsighted? The administration has obviously overlooked the "separation of powers" concept; too little regard is being paid to the importance of the education committees in both the House and the Senate in the whole reorganization process.

And finally, why ignore American politics? There has been too little attention given to our political system. Increased rationality has been given as the desirable and attainable objective but proponents ignored the political aspects of education which must be at least acknowledged if the reorganization is to have either initial or long-term success.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE OPPOSES SPLIT

Mr. President, the administration has not stopped with the child nutrition meal programs. In recent weeks the administration has been desperately working toward a fall-back position; namely the separation of these school meal programs from the "training and nutrition education program" (Sec. 19, Public Law 95–166)—the $26 million annual education and training support services designed to upgrade the quality of meals at school.

True, $26 million is only a fraction of the $3 billion child nutrition program budget, but the separation of the education and training program from the feeding program is an ill-thought-out move for several reasons: meals is well-documented. Results of the only national profile of school food service personnel (a sample of 23,000 schools and 8,500 personnel) issued in February 1977 definitely highlights the need for training of school cafeteria personnel. Survey findings revealed that:

Better than 6 out of 10 workers were promoted or hired as managers without prior training;

Only 3 out of 10 school cafeteria workers completed training in the last 10 years;

Principal reasons for wanting training were to: improve job performance, increase knowledge, learn new food service techniques;

Forty-four percent of the respondents indicated a desire for more training. Mr. President, these grim statistics speak for themselves.

MANY SUPPORTERS OPPOSE TRANSFER

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me remind my colleagues that at last count some 3 dozen organizations had rallied behind the drive to oppose the transfer of any child nutrition program from the Department of Agriculture. They represent thousands of nutrition and health professionals, consumers and consumer groups, farm commodity organizations, and the like. I ask that this list of organizations be printed in the Record.

Let me hasten to add that this organizational support is in addition to the 60 cosponsors of the amendment (including all members of Senate Agriculture Com-

Mr. STEVENS. I would state that I think he has made a good case for maintaining these child nutrition programs in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I concur in the remarks of the Senator from Alaska. On behalf of Senator Ribicoff, I request that the Percy amendment be accepted by unanimous consent.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Hearing none, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. TALMADGE subsequently said: Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TALMADGE. Has a motion to reconsider been made and tabled on the so-called Percy amendment?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Chair, and I appreciate the courtesy of my distinguished friends from Florida and Alaska giving me this privilege.

First, Congress reason for legislating a companion education and training component to address growing allegations of stagnant participation rates, inferior food quality, and resultant food and beverage waste in the school meals.

Our intent for this State grant program was to strengthen, support, and even enhance school meal service, and rid the program of these allegations of taxpayer waste. Thus the emphasis on training school cafeteria personnel to put a better meal on the table, and preparing students to better accept that meal.

Second, these education funds are to be used to provide workshops and other training sessions for school cafeteria personnel on the production and service of high quality and nutritious meals; as well as instruct students about diet and its relationship to good health, and develop a core of teachers to do this instruction.

The "purpose" of this grant program as outlined in Public Law 95–166 makes clear that the training and education provision was designed to encourage effective dissemination of information to children "participating or eligible to participate in the school lunch and related child nutrition programs". It goes on to make clear that "such nutrition education programs shall fully use as a learning laboratory in the school lunch and child nutrition programs". Throughout the legislation the emphasis is school-cafeteria-based education and training.

Mr. President, the need for an education and training program to save school mittee) to oppose the transfer introduced by the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1854

(Purpose: To redesignate the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare as the Department of Health and Human Services)

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send to the desk a Humphrey amendment to redesignate the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare as the Department of Health and Human Services, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), for Mrs. HUMPHREY proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1854.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 67, line 17, strike out "Welfare" and insert "Human Services".

On page 106, line 20, strike out "Welfare" and insert "Human Services".

On page 113, line 15, strike out "Welfare" and insert "Human Services".

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement by Mrs. HUMPHREY be printed in the RECORD prior to the passage of the amendment by Mrs. HUMPHREY.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Statement by Mrs. Humphrey

S. 991 is a bill of great importance to the children of this country and to the future of this Nation. Education is one of the most important aspects of our lives and will continue to become increasingly more important as we address the social, economic, and technological problems that this country faces. Education is the key to conquering these problems and the key to fulfilling the dreams and aspirations of our citizens.

I strongly support this legislation to create a cabinet-level Department of Education. This bill will consolidate the more than 300 educational programs scattered among nearly 40 agencies. It will improve coordination of Federal education programs and help remedy their confusing, fragmented network.

Through this consolidation, we can pinpoint more nearly the problems in educarelated service programs in the Department of Health and Welfare.

I should like to emphasize that my amendment to transfer vocational rehabilitation to the Department of Education should in no way be interpreted to denigrate the importance of the medical and social aspects of rehabilitation. Medical services and research have been in the forefront of the rehabilitation movement and should continue to have the highest priority of RSA, particularly the medical research and training centers. The professional training program of RSA is the only program which supports the training of physicians in rehabilitation medicine, a field of extreme shortage. It should be continued and expanded also.

In closing, let me make two additional points. First, in developing an agency of this nature, some may question if the Federal government is becoming too embroiled in an area that has traditionally been the responsibility of local and state authorities. I believe that this department will not necessarily further involve the Federal government, but will improve its current involvement. Education nationwide must be a shared Federal-State-local responsibility if we are to provide the kind of quality education our children deserve. As costs increase, this responsibility becomes an awesome task that requires cooperation and improved coordination among all parties involved. Only in this manner can we hope to meet tomorrow's educational needs today.

Second, Mr. President, as the bottom line, we should evaluate this legislation on the basis of whether or not it enhances the educational opportunity of the student. I believe it does and urge my colleagues to support the bill.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I believe this amendment has been cleared on

The Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), for Mr. ROTH, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1855.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 64, between lines 10 and 11, insert the following new section:

ANNUAL AUTHORIZATION OF PERSONNEL

SEC. 403. Notwithstanding any other provision of this

(1) Congress shall authorize the end strength as of the end of each fiscal year for personnel for the Department. Except as provided in subsection (b)(1) for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, Congress shall authorize the end strength for any fiscal year by prescribing the maximum number of personnel that may be employed by the Department on the last day of such fiscal year. No funds may be appropriated for any fiscal year to or for the use of personnel of the Department unless the end strength for personnel of the Department for that fiscal year has been authorized by law.

(2) The end strength for personnel authorized by law for the Department for any fiscal year shall be apportioned among the offices and agencies of the Department in such numbers as the Secretary shall prescribe. Except as provided in subsection (b)(2), the Secretary shall, within 120 days after the enactment of legislation authorizing the end strength for personnel of the Department for any fiscal year, prepare and transmit to the Congress a report showing the allocation of such personnel among the tion today. We can address more effectively the educational needs of special children, which for too long have received a totally inadequate response—including the mentally or physically handicapped child.

Most importantly, the bill reaffirms our commitment to a sound educational system. We need a highly visible, high-ranking Federal official who can be held accountable for the successes and failures of our Federal education programs, who can be an effective manager and who can be a strong advocate for education. By creating the position of Secretary of Education, this bill fulfills those needs.

I was pleased to offer an amendment to this bill in Committee to transfer vocational rehabilitation programs from HEW to the Department of Education, to create an Assistant Secretary for and an office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. My amendment was adopted by voice vote.

There are overwhelming advantages to this transfer. First, the effectiveness of the Education for All Handicapped Children Act will be enhanced. Closer relationships between this program and vocational rehabilitation will improve the exchange of expertise and technology between the programs.

Second, better coordination between these programs will facilitate the development of more comprehensive approaches to preparing handicapped young people to make the transition from secondary education to work.

Third, leaving vocational rehabilitation in a Department of Health and Welfare will heighten concern in the handicapped community that efforts will be made to reorient vocational rehabilitation along a welfare line by making eligibility for services contingent on income.

This transfer would open the opportunity for developing new and broader roles for rehabilitation services which is distinct from welfare. It would also protect the program more from attempts to consolidate it with general social services and the welfare-both sides, but I will yield to the Senator from Alaska.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. It is my understanding that this amendment of Senator HUMPHREY's has been agreed to. It seems to be appropriate to make that change in the portion of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare which will remain after this bill becomes law.

Mr. CHILES. We are ready to vote.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1855

(Purpose: To require the Congress to prescribe for the Department for each fiscal year an end strength for personnel)

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment sponsored by Senator ROTH to require Congress to prescribe for the Department for each year an end strength for personnel, and I move that it be accepted, along with his introductory statement, by unanimous consent.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

offices and agencies of the Department. Such report shall include expanations and justifications for the allocations of personnel made by the Secretary among the offices and agencies of the Department.

(3) In computing the authorized end strength for personnel of the Department for any fiscal year, there shall be included all direct-hire and indirect-hire personnel employed to perform functions of the Department whether employed on a full-time, part-time, or intermittent basis, but excluding special employment categories for students and disadvantaged youth, including temporary summer employment.

(4) Whenever any function, power, duty, or activity is transferred or assigned in any fiscal year after the effective date of this Act to the Department from a department or agency outside of the Department, the end strength for personnel authorized for the Department for such fiscal year shall be adjusted to reflect any increases or decreases in personnel required as a result of such transfer or assignment.

(h)(1) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Department is authorized an end strength for personnel equal to the sum of (A) the number of personnel to be employed by the Department under the authorizations provided by other sections of this Act, and (B) the number of personnel transferred, under authority of this Act, to the Department from other departments and agencies of the Government during such fiscal year, as determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget. If the Secretary determines such action is necessary for the effective administration of the Department, he may employ additional personnel during such fiscal year in excess of the number authorized under the preceding sentence, but the number of such additional personnel may not exceed 1 percent of the number authorised under the preceding sentence.

(2) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Secretary shall prepare and transmit the report required by subsection (a)(2) within 120 days after the effective date of this Act.

On page 40, in the table of contents, insert immediately after item Sec. 402, the following:

Sec. 403. Annual authorization of personnel.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if Mr. ROTH were here today, he would have made a statement on behalf of this amendment. It is my understanding that this amendment will add a new section under title IV of the bill which would place a staff ceiling on the new department. The amendment includes a 1-percent leeway in current staff estimates for the department to allow for flexibility in staffing requirements.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete statement Senator ROTH would have delivered be printed in the RECORD.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ROTH

The amendment I am proposing to S. 991, a bill to create a separate Department of Education is a simple one. My amendment would add a new section to the bill under Title IV which would place a staff ceiling on the new department. My amendment includes 1 percent leeway in current staff estimates for the Department to allow for flexibility in staffing requirements. However, I do feel that a ceiling is necessary to exercise some Congressional control over the burgeoning bureaucracy. The Governmental Affairs Committee in considering this bill did not anticipate any staff additions outside of the executive positions newly authorized in the bill. One of the major criticisms of creating a new department of education has been the fear that in its authorization Congress is beefing up a bureaucracy which is already bloated and straining an overtaxed budget. I feel we must be responsive to this concern. We need to emphasize that cost containment for the new Department is as important an objective as the intent to provide education with the priority needed to insure its appropriate attention, and in fact, is desirable in terms of management, efficiency, and accountability in the federal involvement in the educational process. This amendment is not without precedent. Language is incorporated into the authorization for the Department of Defense's civilian staff to place a ceiling annually on these personnel levels. I submit for the RECORD at this time a table showing total Federal Civilian Employment for the Month of June covering a five year period from 1973 to 1978.

The table follows:

TOTAL FEDERAL CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT FOR JUNE 30, SELECTED YEARS, ALL AREAS (INCLUDES CEILING AND NONCEILING)

amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

civilian employment over the 5-year period are in the Department of Defense. It is also interesting to note that language placing a ceiling on federal civilian employment for the Department of Defense was introduced in 1973.

My amendment does not set an exact numerical ceiling for the transition year but provides for the sum of the number of the new personnel authorized in S. 991 and the number of personnel determined by the Office of Management and Budget to be transferred to the new Department on the effective date of the act. Because of the uncertainty of the transfer of some personnel whose functions may have been divided in the current Department of Health Education and Welfare, it has not been possible for the Office of Management and Budget to give an exact numerical requirement. However, they have estimated the figure of personnel for the Department to be approximately 24,700. My amendment will require the Secretary of the Department of Education to report to the Congress within 120 days after the effective date of the Act the exact number of the end strength for personnel for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978 and ending September 30, 1979. It is my understandihg that this language is acceptable to my esteemed colleague Senator Ribicoff and there will be every conscientious effort made to establish a ceiling at the lowest possible level. This ceiling would then be reviewed and established annually through Congressional action. I move for the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. It is my understanding that both the majority and minority of the committee are prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. CHILES. That is correct.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ZORINSKY). Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Chair is in great form today. I like that baritone voice.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that on an amendment to the Department of Education bill by Mr. HAYAKAWA, there be a 2-hour limitation, to be equally divided and controlled in accordance with the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THIRTY-MINUTE RECESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for 30 minutes.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 11:40 a.m., recessed until 12:10 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. FORD).

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate is presently awaiting the arrival of Mr. SCHMITT of New Mexico who, I understand, has been conducting a hearing and who has an amendment or some amendments to the Department of Education bill.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I understand that Mr. SCHMITT has—three?

Mr. STEVENS. I believe he has three amendments, but whatever he has he will offer today, as I understand.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that upon the disposition of the amendments by Mr. SCHMITT to the Department of Education bill, that bill then be set aside with the following time agreement thereon:

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader and other Senators.

It is hoped that upon the disposition of the amendments by Mr. SCHMITT the Senate can go to the vocational rehabilitation bill and work on that during the afternoon, and also during the afternoon, that the Senate can take up the New York City appropriations matter.

It would be the intention of the leadership, once Mr. SCHMITT's amendments are disposed of today, to lay the Department of Education bill aside temporarily and go to the other measures I have mentioned.

With that, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENTS—S. 991

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, with further regard to the agreement on the Department of Education bill, I ask unanimous consent with regard to Mr. HAYAKAWA, who may want to move to recommit the bill, that there be a 1 hour limitation on the motion to recommit, the 1 hour time limitation to his designee. I make that request if it is not agreed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of the agreement follows:

Ordered, That when the Senate resumes consideration of S. 991 (Order No. 1000), a bill to establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. Schmitt) is recognized to call up amendments No. 3620, 3621, or 3619 in any order, on each of which there shall be 1½ hours, to be divided and controlled with 1 hour to the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. Schmitt) and ½ hour to the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Ribicoff), and with no tabling motion to be in order on amendment No. 3619.

Ordered further, That after the disposition of the Schmitt amendments, the Senator from Alaska (Mr. Stevens) be recognized to call up an amendment on which there shall be 80 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill.

Ordered further, That after the disposition of the Stevens amendment, the Senator from California (Mr. Hayakawa) to recognized to call up an amendment on which there shall be 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill.

Ordered further, That after the disposition of the Hayakawa amendment, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Helms) be recognized to call up an amendment on which there shall be 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of such and the manager of the bill.

Ordered further, That after the disposition of the Helms amendment, the Senate pro-

That there be 1 hour on the bill itself, to be equally divided between and controlled by Mr. Ribicoff and Mr. Percy;

That there be a 2-hour limitation on an amendment by Mr. Helms, to be equally divided and controlled in accordance with the usual form; that when the Senate resumes the consideration of the Department of Education bill, following the disposition of the amendments by Mr. Stevens——

Mr. STEVENS. We have an agreement of 40 minutes to each side.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. On which there is a time limit already, there be one amendment by Mr. Hayakawa, on which there is already a time limitation.

Mr. STEVENS. No——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Of 2 hours.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, yes, 2 hours.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That there be one amendment by Mr. Hayakawa, on which there be a time limitation of 2 hours; and that upon the disposition of those amendments the bill be advanced to third reading, without further amendments or motions, appeals, or points of order to be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would ask only that the majority leader modify that to permit a motion to recommit should one be made.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Very well, I so modify the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. That protects them both ways.

be equally divided in accordance with the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on amendment No. 3620 by Mr. Schmitt, amendment No. 3621 by Mr. Schmitt, and amendment No. 3619 by Mr. Schmitt, there be a time limitation on each as follows: One hour under the control of Mr. Schmitt and 30 minutes under the control of Mr. Ribicoff; provided further that on amendment No. 3619, any tabling motion be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is that all satisfactory to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I thank him and the distinguished majority whip for their effort in this matter. It is a perfectly satisfactory agreement and I hope that within the next week, when the bill is finally disposed of, it will be done expeditiously and, of course, favorably on my side.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. There is no agreement as to when the majority leader will call up the bill, but it is the understanding that it will not be this week?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The understandings, I believe, when the order was entered, that the majority leader will call it up at a future time after consultation with the minority leader or ceed to third reading of the bill, without any further amendment, motion, appeal, or point or order being in order, except a motion to recommit to be offered by the Senator from California (Mr. Hayakawa), on which there shall be 1 hour.

Ordered further, That on the question of final passage of the said bill, debate shall be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Ribicoff) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. Percy).

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 95th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Vol. 124 WASHINGTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1978 No. 154

Senate

(Legislative day of Tuesday, September 26, 1978)

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 991).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. At this time, Mr. President, I ask that the Senate resume its consideration of the Department of Education bill. In accordance with the order previously entered, Mr. President, I was to consult with the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. STEVENS. I may state I have discussed this with the distinguished minority leader and we are prepared to proceed in accordance with the majority leader's wish on this matter.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 991) to establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, may I inquire? There were orders entered into. It is my understanding the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. Schmitt) was to call up three amendments under controlled time, and after that my amendment was to be subject to debate and to a vote. It is my understanding that the Senator from North Carolina has a noncontroversial amendment we may wish to consider first. Is that correct?

Mr. RIBICOFF. He is not here. I would like to have the opportunity to look at it. If it is the same amendment we saw last week, we would accept it.

Mr. STEVENS. Is the Senator from New Mexico prepared to present his amendments at this time?

Mr. SCHMITT. I am prepared to present my amendments. I would ask to make an opening statement on the bill, if that is agreeable. It will be short.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I certainly have no objection. If the Senator would allow me, I would like to make a very brief statement.

It is my hope that the Senate will complete action on this bill today.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, while we are getting organized, I will ask the distinguished Senator from Alaska if he wishes to proceed to his amendment. I understand he is under some specific time constraint. I would be happy to present my opening statement and then lay my amendment aside until his amendment is dispensed with.

Mr. STEVENS. I would be happy to do it after the Senator from New Mexico presents his first amendment. I would be very appreciative if the Senator from New Mexico would permit me to call up my amendment so that the vote will take place before 7 o'clock because we do have a markup at 7 o'clock, which I must attend. So any time we can call up the matter before 7 o'clock and have the vote before 7 o'clock, I would appreciate it.

Mr. SCHMITT. Then we will proceed to the first Schmitt amendment with the understanding that the amendment of the Senator from Alaska will be next. I would presume that will take unanimous consent, which I am sure the Senate will grant.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SCHMITT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for Dr. John Backer of my staff to be granted the privileges in the consideration of this measure today.

AMENDMENT NO. 3620

(Purpose: To delete the transfer of agencies and functions from the Department of Defense to the Department.)

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 3620 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The lgeislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. Schmitt) proposes an amendment numbered 3620.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hodges). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 49, line 10, strike out "section 203(11)" and insert "section 203(10)".

On page 49, line 15, strike out "(13)" and insert "(12)".

On page 49, strike out lines 17 through 23.

On page 49, line 24, strike out "(f)" and insert "(e)".

On page 50, line 4, strike out "(g)" and insert "(f)".

On page 50, line 6, strike out "(f)" and insert "(e)".

On page 51, strike out lines 7 through 9.

On page 51, line 10, strike out "(9)" and insert "(8)".

On page 51, line 12, strike out "(10)" and insert "(9)".

On page 51, line 15, strike out "(11)" and insert "(10)".

Therefore, I would anticipate a fairly lengthy session today and several rollcall votes. I hope both cloakrooms will announce to Senators that we do expect rollcall votes and expect a late session in an effort to complete action on this bill today. I have no objection to the Senator from New Mexico proceeding.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, are we under controlled time now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is under controlled time now.

Mr. STEVENS. If the Senator from New Mexico calls up his first amendment, he would then have 1½ hours at his disposal on that first amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHMITT. I have the floor now and I would be happy to yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

ORDER THAT S. 2441 AND S. 2541 BE INDEFINITELY POSTPONED

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that calendar order No. 788, S. 2441, a bill entitled the "Federal Public Transportation Act of 1978," and calendar order No. 800, S. 2541, a bill to amend chapter 4 of title 23 of the United States Code to authorize appropriations for certain highway safety programs, and for other purposes, be indefinitely postponed. This is in conformity with the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I also ask unanimous consent that Eugene Iwanciu of my staff be granted the privileges of the floor during the consideration of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. And Sally Rogers of my staff and James Lockemy from the Judiciary staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. May I ask also for Letitia Chambers of my staff to be granted the privileges of the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the Senator yield further to allow me to make a comment for a half-minute?

Mr. SCHMITT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DOMENICI. I want to thank my colleagues, Senator Ribicoff, and Senator Percy for working out the arrangement which will permit us to conclude this measure today. I have had a genuine interest. Because of time problems, I was concerned that I would not be around when we voted on it. I greatly appreciate the efforts to conclude the matter. Whether we agree or not on the issue, I am very grateful and I want to indicate that.

Mr. SCHMITT. I appreciate the comments of the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico. His wishes and needs in this matter are a major part

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, this Nation, any democratic nation, in fact, will rise or fall on the quality of its educational system. An informed and literate electorate is the one essential ingredient for the survival of a representative democracy. The society in general, and the electoral process in particular, requires a continuous rejuvenation of the imagination and innovation of the people they serve.

Our success as a Nation is the result of a continuous tapping of a uniquely American reservoir of individual and geographic diversity. This has been accomplished through our ancestor's foresight in the constitutional encouragement of a locally controlled educational system.

Unfortunately, this locally controlled educational system is under attack by those who believe, as Alexander Hamilton did, that there is a national elite which can better govern the people than can the people themselves. I only wish that Thomas Jefferson, Hamilton's protagonist in these matters, could join once again in the congressional debate in the issue of a Federal department of education.

Now, debate in the Senate has focused on a bill which would create a new Federal department for the educational elite. Under the proposed bill, the "E" would be taken out of HEW, and educational programs, which are presently scattered throughout numerous agencies and departments, would be consolidated into a new, all-encompassing unit—a Department of Education. The result, according to proponents of the bill, ance, to State,and local authorities, has emerged as de facto control through the threat of withholding funds upon which local systems had become dependent. The creation of a department of education obviously will strengthen this trend toward centralized decisionmaking in the field of education.

Proponents of a separate Department of Education have argued that all major Western nations have an Education Ministry and that it is time for the United States to make a similar commitment to education. Two points must be kept in mind in analyzing this argument. First, education in other nations traditionally has been centralized, while in the United States it has traditionally been decentralized. To quote from the dissenting views of members of the House Government Operations Committee:

> In France, a nation with a ministry (of education), one can enter any third or fourth or fifth grade classroom in the country at a given time of day and find the same subjects being taught in the same way. That is the worst possible argument for a department!

I agree. That is the worst possible argument for a Department of Education in the United States.

Then there is the argument that the United States must make a greater commitment to education. I think it is clear throughout the world that this country traditionally has made a great commitment to education, probably the greatest overall commitment to public education in recetn decades, is the last thing that education in the United States needs and the last thing most Americans want.

Proponents of the new department will argue that it is clear in both the Senate and House bills that the department of education is only to assist State and local authorities, and not to impose regulations upon them in contrast to the arguments I have just presented. This, however, is claimed at the present time by the existing Office of Education and existing educational groups. Yet regulations are being imposed through financial coercion. The proposed department of education would accelerate the process of bureaucratic takeover of our educational system. The Federal Government provides about 10 percent of the finances spent on elementary and secondary education in this country. However, as education is marginally financed—Mr. President, I emphasize that phrase, "marginally financed." It is not profitmaking, it is marginally financed. As it is, it permits almost 100 percent control in many school districts, if not most, in the country. No educational system can afford to lose 10 percent of its funds off the top once they have become dependent on them. Thus comes the mechanism of Federal control.

The people of the United States want less government and not more. They want less governmental control and not more. They want less regulations and not more. Yet, the creation of this new department will result in more government, more governmental control, and would mean greater coordination and efficiency in the administration of educational programs.

While its supporters have argued that the new department is nothing more than a "reorganization" which will result in greater efficiency, there is reason to question this view as to both the result and the motivation. John Royer, president of the National Educational Association, the primary driving force behind the creation of this department, stated:

> Creating a department of education is, indeed, a profound step in which the Federal Government will be recognising for the first time, that it has a responsibility for education in and of itself.

Mr. President, this view differs substantially from that of the claim that the proposed department is "just a reorganization." Again, Mr. Royer states:

> The Federal Government has a responsibility for education in and of itself.

That is hardly just a reorganization. Education in the United States has traditionally been the responsibility of local and State authorities. By its silence on education, the Constitution specifically leaves control to the individual States. Thus, it has been the local parents, teachers, and school boards who have set policies and have decided what is to be taught. This diversity of education has helped preserve our reservoir of national diversity. A department of education is clearly a long first step toward the destruction of much of this diversity.

During the last decade, the Federal Government has become more and more involved in education. What started out as assistance, primarily financial assistance of any nation in the world. And I agree that we must make greater commitments to education. But, Mr. President, we must make them as a society, not as a central government.

One need only look at the spending of the Federal Government to know that major new financial commitments have been made in recent years. In special educational needs, and in increasing the equality of educational opportunity, much progress has been made. Ironically, however, as we have been spending more money on education, as we have seen more and more Federal control and manipulation of education, the general quality of education has been declining. Obviously, more money and more bureaucratic control has not improved education overall. Money and lack of Federal control clearly are not the principal problems.

The proposed department is expressly designed to provide more money and more Federal control of education. No one, I think, will deny that. It is not difficult to imagine this department establishing national "advisory" standards at some point in the future. Later, the department could require adherence to the compulsory standards, if Federal aid is to be continued. Next, standard tests, developed by the Federal Government, could be mandated to check whether the compulsory standards are being met. Last, State and local authorities will be coerced into acceptance of a standardized curriculum as the "only possible" guarantee of meeting compulsory standards. This classic bureaucratic process, one which we have seen again and again more regulations in education than we have ever seen before.

A strong indication of the direction that this new department will take is in the proposal regarding Department of Defense schools, to which the pending amendment is directed. The Defense Department operates 267 overseas schools for the children of military personnel. At the present time, there are about 135,000 students enrolled in these schools. These children have very special needs and concerns related to their unique and changing social environment. The Department of Defense has successfully administered these schools for 30 years. The supporters of the proposed Department of Education insist that these schools be transferred under the jurisdiction of the new department.

Proponents of the department argue that the department will only assist education in this country. Yet, they insist that the department administer, on a day-to-day basis, the equivalent of the 11th largest school district in the United States, namely, those of the Department of Defense. Clearly, the camel's nose would be in the tent, with an organized special interest group pushing hard from the rear.

The fear that this education department may become the national school board has prompted from various groups, including Republicans and Democrats, liberals and conservatives, the American Federation of Teachers, and leading newspapers such as the New York Times and the Washington Post.

There is no question that the United States must have a deep commitment to education; our future depends on that commitment. The commitment, however, must be met through local and State control of education with appropriate assistance from the Federal Government to insure that there is equal educational opportunity. Although the goal of equal educational opportunity may require block grants on a selective basis from the Federal Treasury, there is no reason to believe, nor is there any historical evidence to prove, that the quality of education will be improved by the increased Federal control that a new Department of Education would encourage.

If education in the United States is in need, what then is the answer, if a department of education is not the answer? The answer may be an independent agency for education that takes over HEW's educational responsibilities, and acts to assist, but not interfer, with local efforts. I shall discuss this concept further in a later amendment. Assistance should be in the form of block grants where equal educational opportunity can only be insured by more money, in the form of research on setting educational standards that meet local needs, and in the form of research on improvement of the quality and quantity of basic education. There is need for improvement there, which is obvious to everyone today in this country. The special educational needs associated with most existing Federal departments and agencies, other than HEW, can be best met by leaving the responsibility for such education in the mission agencies.

logistics involved in having a Washington-based federal education department involve itself in the overseas schools that the needs of the children and of the teachers would be better served by improving the relationship that currently exists between these schools and the military bases they serve. They also point out this transfer would place a layer of bureaucracy between the schools who would be administered by a federal education department in Washington and the constituency of these schools, the parents and the children stationed overseas.

We see little value in the transfer and we urge all Senators to vote for your amendment.

Sincerely,

GREGORY A. HUMPHREY,
Co-Director of Legislation.

Mr. President, I would go now into more detail with respect to the pending amendment, relative to the transfer of the overseas schools from the Department of Defense to the Department of Education.

First, Mr. President, the mission of these overseas schools is to serve the military communities and, literally, no one else except for their broader responsibility to serve the Nation. The schools and those communities are intertwined in ways that are unlike schools in the States.

The schools must depend upon the military for many service functions—personnel, travel, supplies, maintenance, and food service. The costs of duplicating those services for the schools alone would be prohibitive, and it is foolish to believe that the bureaucracices of two Cabinet agencies will cooperate to prevent duplication.

granted privilege of the floor; and that Senator HAYAKAWA and Senator THURMOND be added as cosponsors to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, in addition, there is a great concern among many individuals who may even favor establishment of a Department of Education, but are concerned about the question of the overseas schools, that this new Department of Education will seek to use these schools for experimentation.

These schools are probably unique in our educational system in that there is a crying need for stability.

The reason for this is the transfer of military personnel, after a 2- or 3- or sometimes 4-year period, from one base to another and the need within that environment, somewhat destabilizing in itself, to have stability in the education system of the children of these military personnel.

The normal tour of duty at a given military base for overseas personnel is about 3 years. That results in children changing schools every 3 years. That change may be to another overseas base or to a stateside school.

In either event, the importance of a consistency in curriculum and educational program among the overseas schools is obvious so that the child's educational experiences can proceed with a minimum of adjustment problems.

This has been, clearly, the goal, and it is a goal which has been met, to a large

That is the thrust of the pending amendment. It will be the thrust of another amendment by the Senator from New Mexico. It will also be the thrust of an amendment by the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. President, it is hoped that our efforts to improve Government will soon lead us to the realization that bureaucratic bigness is not bureaucratic goodness. Thus, we must begin to decrease the number of unnecessary departments in favor of independent agencies with clearly bounded charters. At the same time, the Congress must take on more explicit responsibility for the prior review and approval, or disapproval, of the actions of these agencies.

Mr. President, in these general remarks, I would bring to my colleagues' attention a letter dated today from the American Federation of Teachers. It reads as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS,
Washington, D.C., September 28, 1978.
Hon. HARRISON H. SCHMITT,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHMITT: It has come to my attention that you intend to offer an amendment to S. 991, the Department of Education Organization Act to eliminate the proposed transfer of the Overseas Dependent School System included in the Department of Education Bill.

As you know from previous correspondence, the AFT strongly opposes S. 991 and urges all Members of the Senate to vote against it. We do, however, support your amendment and urge its adoption. The Overseas Federation of Teachers, AFT Local 1470 opposes the transfer of this school system. It is their belief that because of the extremely difficult

There is very little indication in our experience to show that.

Costs very probably would go up 10 to 15 percent. In the operation of these schools.

Teaching personnel depend upon DOD for food and supplies through access to base exchanges and, in many locations, for housing. Transfer will cut that access and throw teaching staff on the economy in most areas. Given dollar exchange rate problem, that will be disastrous for many of the individuals, if not most, related to this teaching establishment in the overseas schools.

Schools are used for other base activities. With a transfer, that use will evaporate, or at least be subject to another layer of bureaucracy. The bureaucratic problems of paying for fuel, lights, and maintenance will be overwhelming, again, if our experience with interdepartmental coordination has anything to teach us.

More than 99 percent of new department's energies and attention will be focused on the grants process. That is largely the function now of the Department of HEW. The problems and personnel required to run a school system of 150,000 children are simply incompatible with this other completely unrelated bureaucratic process of grant approval.

Finally, all the Department of Defense needs is another agency helping out on its bases which are critical to our national defense structure.

Mr. President, I would interrupt my remarks at this point to ask unanimous consent that Jim Lockemy and Hugh Hadden of Senator THURMOND's staff be part, by the Department of Defense over the last several decades.

Currently the DOD schools' personnel are staff members in the Department of Defense, have full security clearances, and receive advance information on troop transfers so that plans may be made for school operation when the children arrive at a new base.

Clearly, this transfer of the overseas school responsibility to a new Department of Education would interfere in the educational planning and the related national security problems that come with them.

Under the "split agency" arrangement, those operating the schools might not be apprised in sufficient time to plan for school operation. Transfer to a Department of Education would require security clearances for those personnel involved in the budgetary planning and various other functions related to the operation of the schools.

Additionally, Mr. President, under operation by a Department of Education, cost efficiency factors might dictate closing of a school even though the military interests might be to maintain a school as an evidence of a national commitment to an area or as a means of maintaining a relatively high level of troop morale through the presence of the family. Specific examples at the moment are at Guantanamo Bay and Bahrain on the Persian Gulf.

Budget cutters in a Department of Education might want to close the schools so that the budget could be reduced even though the total national interest might suggest another course of action.

I do not expect, by these remarks, that the budget of the Department of Education ever will be reduced in any significant amount once it is created.

Since the DOD schools would be the only agency operating K–12 schools that would be in the Department of Education, it would be essentially an appendage subservient to the whims of the Secretary and planners of the agency. This could constitute a serious problem of uncertainty if there should be as many Secretaries of Education as there have been Commissioners of Education in the past 16 years—8 appointed and 4 additional as acting. The importance of continued attention to quality education for military dependents suggests that the entity should be in an organization with relative continuity of leadership.

Currently, in the transfer of personnel, when children have a need for a special type of educational program, consideration is given to that particular need of the child in determining the next duty location. A concrete example may be found in the transfer procedures for Air Force personnel. One can only speculate whether or not this cooperation would be maintained under the proposed transfer. If it were not, the Department of Education could be subjected to continuing complaints about program inadequacies.

Perhaps the greatest concern, although there are many who oppose on the outside the transfer of the overseas schools

Teacher relocation. Teachers are now able to borrow from the base portermaster a number of personal household furnishings such as refrigerators, stoves, and cooking utensils until those items are shipped to them from the States. This loan of goods may last up to 90 days.

Base exchange and commissaries. Teachers have access to the base exchange and commissary for the purchase of groceries, clothing, and other personal items. In many countries these are the only places where U.S. goods are available except on the black market, BX and commissary use is carefully controlled by the military.

Officers' clubs and mess halls. In many instances the officers' clubs and mess halls are the only facilities on or near a base that provides three hot meals a day. For single teachers on a base, these facilities are essential.

Health care. The military health facilities are the best available to teachers overseas. Teachers are entitled to emergency care and depend upon the base for health and medical supplies. In many places health care is simply not available offbase.

Personnel services. The military personnel offices process all teachers' personnel papers, including passports, shipping arrangements, and transportation.

Facilities. The construction of new buildings or additions to existing facilities is now worked out with the civil engineer on the military base. Without access to that military expertise, the schools would not have the ability to Mail. Currently teachers have access to military mail systems which involve the use of APO and FPO numbers. This reduces cost for mailing and provides for expedited delivery in service.

Teacher transportation. Teachers are able to use military flights on space-available basis for transportation to regional curriculum development meetings, and central office administrators are able to use these military flights in order to maintain contact and liaison with the schools in that area. Teachers are also able to use space-available flights for recreational leave and other purposes.

Other facilities and services. Other facilities and services offered by the military whose availability might be jeopardized include gasoline and automotive services, dry cleaning and laundry facilities, recreational facilities, and the provision of drivers' license and automobile tags. In most areas the military recreation facilities are the only ones which exist within a reasonable distance of the base for use by teachers and their families.

Mr. President, I do not proceed with this list for the sole purpose of saying that those arrangements cannot conceivably be made. In theory, they can. But, again, I remind Senators that we are talking about two major bureaucratic elements of the U.S. Government working out in extreme detail the kinds of relationships between people that now exist very efficiently within the Department of Defense. I do not believe that in many of the cases I have just enumerated into the proposed Department of Education, is that those schools will suffer because of a divided interest in the agency.

Various concerns have been raised about the new department being an operating agency, but perhaps the most critical concern would be the divided attention of the top leadership as attention—or neglect—would be required for the effective operation of the DOD schools and evolving functions of the department with reference to the ongoing elementary, secondary, and postsecondary institutions located in the United States.

Mr. President, I think it would be useful, for the purpose of the record, to have somewhat more detail with respect to the basic relationship that now exists between the Department of Defense schools and military support systems within specific bases and within the Department of Defense as a whole.

Currently, the Department of Defense schools are dependent on the military for a wide variety of support services. The transfer of the schools to a new Department of Education would unquestionably endanger the availability of these services.

Housing. In many cases, on-base housing is provided for teaching personnel, particularly in areas where bases are isolated such as in Turkey or where off-base housing is not available to American staff such as in Iceland. Where housing is available off base, teachers have access to the Housing Referral Service which utilizes U.S. standards of housing in determining availability of off-base facilities.

make those arrangements onsite. Custodial contracts are arranged for by the base commanding officer for the entire base. The cleaning of the school is only a small part of that contract. In many instances it would be economically impossible to arrange custodial services for a single facility such as the schools.

Repair and maintenance. The repair and maintenance of school facilities is handled through the base civil engineer. This includes arrangements for emergency repairs in instances where water pipes freeze, furnaces explode, windows are broken, et cetera. It would be economically impossible for each school to have the personnel and equipment to handle its own repair and maintenance.

Supplies. Schools are entirely dependent upon defense shipping and supply lines for books, equipment, and all other school supplies. Schools receive supplies directly on a drop shipping basis from the military warehouse in Richmond. The duplication of this system would be the most costly and difficult logistical support service.

Bus transportation. In no instance do the schools operate their own buses. Transportation is contracted with the military department at that base with the commander making arrangements with the school superintendent or principal. Transportation is worked out between school authorities and the base transportation officer. Because the schools are able to use military buses already at those facilities, costs are kept to a minimum. Transportation is a very important element of the overseas schools since the vast majority of students are bused to school.

such arrangements can be worked out easily or, at the very least, can be worked out efficiently.

Mr. President, there have been a number of hearings on this issue, not only in the Senate but also in the other body; and I think that some of the comments that have come out of those hearings are important for consideration here today.

For example, in a hearing before the Subcommittee on Labor Standards and the Subcommittee on Elementary and Secondary Vocational Education of the House Committee on Education and Labor, on February 1, 1978, in dealing with the Defense Dependents' Education Act of 1978, Dr. Thomas D. Minter, Deputy Commissioner, Bureau of Elementary and Secondary Education, was questioned by Representative John Erlenborn, the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Labor Standards. In their discussion, the following took place:

> Mr. ERLENBORN. How do you personally feel about the Office of Education or HEW being in the business of operating schools?
> Mr. MINTER. Well, I don't believe that we should be in the business of operating schools, certainly. I don't think that it is our function and I don't think that it is the intent of Congress.

Mr. President, obviously, that is the intent of this bill that is before the Senate at this time. It is not only the intent; it will be the law.

Similarly, at a hearing before the Subcommittee on Labor of the House Committee on Education and Labor, on April 24 and 25, 1974, dealing with H.R. 3157, the National Overseas Education Act of 1973, Dr. Anthony Cardinale, Director of Dependents Education, Office of the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Education, said as follows:

> Since all schools are located on military installations or are on leased facilities under control of the local military commander, operation of these schools by an outside agency could possibly create more problems than would be solved.
> The department of Defense has a moral commitment to its members, both military and civilian, to insure that the minor school-age dependents continue to receive a quality education.
> Personnel residing on military installations or stationed overseas look to the Department of Defense to provide all required support, including education. Thus, we do not consider it feasible or desirable to remove this important responsibility from the Department of Defense.
> Through the many resources already available within the Department of Defense, such as transportation, communication, logistical and administrative support channels, the educational needs of the dependents are being met.
> The logistical support system necessary to maintain the worldwide dependents education program is now provided by the base commander through the military departments. To remove the budgetmaking process and budget decisions from the military departments and the Department of Defense places both in an inoperative position.
> In summary, we have a good educational system. The current management review, which is based on solid sources, will make the system even more effective and responsive to those it serves.
> Therefore, it does not appear appropriate at this time to make any additional substantive changes which would result in disruption or the loss of present continuity.
> The costs would rise because of the need to duplicate such a support system. Again, the argument against the operation of any schools by a Department of Education should, alone, be decisive.
> It is recommended that responsibility for dependents schools remain with the Department of Defense and such other agencies as operate them overseas.

And I might add that Rufus E. Miles, the author of the preceding remarks, is a major authority on the Department of Education, and he supports the Department of Education but clearly does not support, and with good cogent argument, the transfer of the overseas schools to that Department.

Mr. President, I also cite as somewhat of an authority the Office of Management and Budget. In their report on the Department of Education they concluded that the Department of Defense schools had many problems. However, steps to straighten out the problems should be made, not transferred to the Department of Education.

They cite the potential disadvantages of moving the dependent schools to include:

> 1. Problems of coordinating logistical and housekeeping support for the schools would be increased. The schools now rely completely on the military for logistical and housekeeping support. It is the most readily available and seems to be the most efficient and economic source of such support. If the schools were transferred to the Department of Education, the acquisition of these kinds of support from the military would become cumbersome and bureaucratic, and the schools would suffer as a result. A transfer problems more effectively than can the Department of Defense. In fact, the new department might find this responsibility to be incredibly burdensome.
> Although transfer of the schools is not recommended at this time, the following options are suggested:
> The President's Reorganization Project should monitor closely the reorganization of the Overseas Dependents' Schools which is currently underway. Upon its completion, an evaluation should be made of the extent to which it has improved the effectiveness of the operation. Recommendations for further change may be in order.
> A linkage should be developed between the Defense Department and the Department of Education by giving the latter legislative authority for oversight and evaluation of the Overseas Dependents' Schools (as well as other Federally operated schools) and to report results to the President and Congress. This oversight relationship should be similar to one between a State Department of Education and a local school district.
> There should be created legislatively an Educational Policy Advisory Board composed of Federal and public education officials, administrators and teachers to review and advise the Director of the Overseas Dependents' Schools on the educational directions of the schools. The system seems to border on being a closed society; it could benefit from the insights and experience of those at various levels of public education.

The remarks of the Office of Management and Budget.

Mr. President, I do not concur completely with the recommendations of OMB, although I read them in their entirety. I do feel, however, we should pay very close attention to their analysis of

Similarly, Mr. President, in the hearing on the H.R. 3157 Representative JOHN DENT, chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor Standards said as follows:

> An overseas school system would not, in my opinion, ever be able to be divorced from the Department of Defense as such but it would be administered as a school system and not, as is now the case, as a small appendage of a defense operation.

Carol Kimmel, president of the National Congress of the PTA said in a letter, October 8, 1975 to Representative ALBERT H. QUIE, ranking minority member, House Committee on Education and Labor:

> With control in a central office in Washington, military commanders no longer will have any responsibility for the schools and the schools, as a result, will be denied vital logistical support from the military. Such services, for example, transportation of students would have to be contracted out. . . .
> We seriously question whether parents of the children attending Overseas Dependents Schools can be meaningfully involved in the decision making process when control and total responsibility for their schools are placed in a central office in Washington, D.C.

Finally, Rufus E. Miles, Jr., in his article, "A Cabinet Department of Education: Analysis and Proposal," American Council on Education, 1976, said as follows:

> The Department of Defense has a system in being that is operated overseas where the logistic support is adjunct to its other logistic support of bases and personnel. A Department of Education would have no such logistic support, nor any other advantage that would make it wise to consider transferring the operation to a Department of Education would in effect be recreating, at least in part, an excessively layered structure, which is the very thing DOD is attempting to eliminate. This could require an excessive amount of time of officials in higher reaches of both departments and produce adverse effects on the attainment of goals.
> 2. Removing control and operation of the schools from the Department of Defense would have a negative impact on military personnel. It is highly likely that the military hierarchy, the Congressional supporters of the armed services, and some of the parents of the school children would see a transfer of the schools as a serious undermining of their control and traditional responsibilities. Some parents of the children, in particular, may see the transfer of the schools as an attempt to set their children up in a vast experimental laboratory. The schools are no doubt seen as being an intricate part of the defense family. They are in effect an employee benefit. From what we have learned thus far, the educational programs are generally adequate. To set off a furor among the military simply for the sake of consolidating the schools with other activities in the Department of Education seems not to make much sense.
> 3. There is some concern that transfer would lead to intrusion in the educational programs of the schools. The schools might be viewed as an opportunity to experiment by many education staff. At least at the outset, there could be an irrepressible urge to observe, study and tinker with the programs of the schools.
> 4. There would be no advantages to the large majority of Americans from the transfer of the schools.
> The problems highlighted here are being worked on in the Defense Department by tightening management controls and by reorganizing the Dependents' Schools. There seems to be little opportunity for the new Department of Education to address the effect and of the problems associated with the transfer of the overseas schools to the proposed Department of Education.

Finally, Mr. President, in summary of this issue, I think there is no question in all of the expert opinion that I have encountered in my examination of this issue, including that of the Office of Management and Budget, the American Teachers Federation, the numerous individuals around the country and in New Mexico that I have talked to, there can be any value whatsoever derived from the transfer of the school system to the proposed Department of Education.

There is no question that the bureaucratic load on both Departments would increase, and who is ultimately hurt by this bureaucracy? The students, the teachers, and the parents in the school system itself.

The costs will almost certainly increase because of this increased bureaucracy and the need to duplicate in many circumstances the increase of the logistical support of the school system, and I am afraid there is going to be considerably less understanding of the needs, the very special needs, of the overseas schools.

Most importantly, the Department of Education, in this Senator's opinion, should never, if it is created, have an operating school system under its jurisdiction. It is not only beyond the intent of the Constitution, it is beyond any reasonable need, any reasonable perception of need, of this great country.

There is no question but what, at first, there will be a tremendous temptation by the Department of Education to experiment with the school system that they now own lock, stock, and barrel.

Beyond that, it would provide the first step toward a national school system and that, I think, Mr. President, would be one of the worst mistakes this country could ever make.

At the very least, I think we should postpone any consideration of the transfer of the overseas school system to the Department of Education until some time in the future when that department, if it is in fact created—and I hope it is not, but if it is created—has time to get its own act in order, and then let us evaluate the pros and cons of that transfer in the light of the two existing departments, not in the light of the department that does exist, and is operating a school efficiently and well, and a department which does not exist, which is just right now a gleam of hope in the eyes of many of the educational elite.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the majority leader would like to work on a unanimous-consent agreement, and I would be happy to yield to him if I do not lose my right to the floor, and request unanimous consent that I can proceed after he is through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENTSEN). The majority leader is recognized.

MODIFICATION OF UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I believe, if the Senator will look at the calendar, he will find the answer; the reason I say this is that I am unable to remember just what the details were with respect to Mr. HAYAKAWA's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will call up an amendment on which there will be 2 hours equally divided.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. HAYAKAWA, I believe, would have 1 hour on an amendment and 1 hour on a motion to recommit, equally divided.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New Mexico for yielding I thank all Senators for the agreement that the Senate complete its business before 9:30.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SCHMITT. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Howard Orenstein of my staff be granted the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time so that the distinguished Senator from Con-asked ourselves which agency of the Federal Government would be in the best position to provide the highest quality education to the 135,000 students in the DOD schools.

Looking objectively at the merits of the issue, I think there is an overwhelming case to be made for the transfer.

We should not expect the Defense Department to have the expertise of running a public education system. Obviously, the purpose of the DOD schools is more in line with the mission of the Department of Education than of Defense.

These schools are not integrally related to the maintenance of the national defense posture. The schools do not prepare its students for any purposes related to the military. They are regular American elementary and secondary schools.

The schools are not a priority at the Defense Department. How could a $350 million public school system receive the professional attention it needs in a $100 billion Department?

The expertise in the field of education will be in the Department of Education. The many and varied educational programs in the new Department should be made available for the improvement of these schools. Programs for gifted and talented children, academic facilities improvement, and educational research—to name a few—are all badly needed functions which will benefit the DOD schools in the new Department.

agreement on the pending measure, the Department of Education bill, be modified as follows: that there be 1 additional hour under the control of Mr. Schmitt, and that a final vote occur no later than 9:30 p.m. today with paragraph 3 of rule XII waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I am sure I will not object, I will just ask, for the Record, and for my colleagues, I presume that takes into account the pending unanimous-consent agreement and for the various amendments and the total time up to the final vote is a cumulative total?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The pending agreement would not change it in any respect, beyond what I have requested. That the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. Schmitt) have 1 additional hour and that a final vote occur on the passage of the bill at no later than 9:30 p.m. today.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If the Senator from New Mexico will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SCHMITT. I have yielded for the purpose of adopting this time agreement. I will yield now to the Senator from California.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished majority leader with respect to my amendment in this unanimous-consent agreement, it does not touch mine?

necticut or the distinguished Senator from Illinois may have a chance to respond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. The Governmental Affairs Committee gave serious and thorough consideration to the transfer of the Defense Department's overseas dependents schools to the new Department of Education.

We devoted 1 day of hearings to the transfer of these important schools. This transfer is supported by nearly all parties involved, including the Overseas Education Association—which holds exclusive recognition for the 7,000 DOD teachers—the European Congress of American Parents, Teachers, and Students, and the Department of Defense.

If the DOD school system were within the continental United States, it would rank as our 12th largest elementary and secondary school system.

If we are going to create a Federal Department of Education, I think it would be unfortunate not to allow this school system to participate in education programs serving the rest of the country's children.

The DOD schools exist for a specific purpose—to provide education for dependents of our military personnel. They are one of the very few public school systems operated by the Federal Government.

When the committee studied the creation of the Department of Education, we

I believe locating the dependents schools in the new Department of Education will result in a wide range of benefits for the schools. Being administered in the Education Department, the schools will be kept in touch with the latest education trends and technologies. The Secretary of Education will be the most knowledgeable Federal official in the field. He or she will have broad access to a wide range of experts and materials which could help with problems in the DOD schools.

The transfer will provide continuity for students alternating from DOD schools and continental U.S. public schools. The average term of duty for members of the military overseas is usually 3 years or less. So there is a great amount of movement for students between the various school systems. Students will learn more if they can simply pick up where they left off after leaving one system for the other.

And, most importantly, S. 991 will provide the DOD schools with a legislative base upon which to operate. As my colleagues know, these schools have been authorized in the past only by the congressional appropriations committees. Congress will then be in a better position to more effectively oversee the efficient and quality operation of the schools, and recommend necessary changes.

Mr. President, the dependents schools have had a troubled history. As late as 1976, the schools were found to have serious deficiencies in curriculum planning, educational testing, teacher qualifications, academic standards, and academic facilities. While the situation has improved somewhat over the years, there is still much room for improvement. I ask unanimous consent that a two-part series of articles of the "Dependents Schools in Europe—A Disorganized System in Danger of Flunking," written by Rick Barnard for the Times magazine, be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPENDENTS SCHOOLS IN EUROPE: A DISORGANIZED SYSTEM IN DANGER OF FLUNKING

(By Richard C. Barnard)

Marleah Reed, a senior at Nuremberg American High School in Germany, stood in front of her debate class and exhibited her drawings as she delivered a point-by-point argument designed to convince her teacher and classmates that a fetus is a human being and, therefore, abortion is murder.

She then sat and listened as her two opponents read through page after page of technical jargon they obviously had copied verbatim from some medical text. One debater didn't know the meaning or correct pronunciation of many of the words she used. Yet no one in the class, including the teacher, seemed surprised that Marleah's opponents had done no original work of their own.

Marleah received excellent marks for her presentation and her two opponents—who had demonstrated little more than the ability to crib—were given passing marks.

"That gives you an idea of what goes on here," said Marleah as she walked down the school's dark, grimy hallway after class. "My last school was in Washington state. The teachers there had us doing term papers in our sophomore year. Here, we never do term children who go to school without the workbooks and texts that students elsewhere take for granted.

The mother of a girl in the second grade at the Nuremberg Elementary School annex said, "my father was in the Army and I went to Stuttgart High myself. Back then, I couldn't see any difference between public schools back home and the dependents schools. I can't say that now. My kid spends every Frday afternoon in school doing macrame or playing chess or going bowling. I just don't feel she's getting the best."

Others disagreed. Emily Johnson, who has a daughter in the Wiesbaden schools, said, "My child is getting as good an education as she could get anywhere."

Despite disagreement over its quality there is one obvious certainty about the dependents school system in Europe: The children of most Army people (and of many Air Force and Navy personnel) will obtain part of their education there.

"Europe is where the action is," said Gen. George S. Blanchard, commander of the U.S. Army in Europe, in a recent speech to parents. "The ambitious guy wants to come here and get into the thick of it.

"But I want him to want to come here because his family is going to get something out of it as well. And that means, among other things, a quality education. [To military people] the schools are the most important thing in the world."

WHAT IS THE DEPENDENTS SCHOOL SYSTEM?

The dependents school system in Europe has been in existence for 30 years. In 1946, 38 elementary schools and five high schools—some no more than a collection of tents and quonset huts—opened their doors to 1297 military children who trudged to class through the ruins of a defeated Germany.

As military families poured overseas at the end of World War II, the military de- with the chief of dependents schools in Europe, Dr. Joseph A. Mason. Instead, any order or suggestion or inquiry from Cardinale had to go to the Office of the Army Adjutant General. Perhaps his missives would reach Mason and perhaps not. Any that did went through 10 separate layers of Army bureaucracy and often took 30 days one way.

Cardinale complained to his boss, Roger T. Kelley, then Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower and Reserve Affairs, that the Army's reading of the directive left him powerless. Kelley okayed the Army interpretation though he never gave it his formal, written approval, according to a 1973 House Appropriations Committee report on the schools. Thus the unified school system that existed on paper never existed in fact.

The school system in Europe went its own independent way with Mason at the helm. Last year, it had 5600 teachers, a budget of $147 million and ranked in size among the top 25 school systems in the U.S. In size and student population, it is roughly equal to the school system in St. Louis, Mo.

Dependents schools are spread from Norway to Turkey to North Africa. The Army did not build any schools in the Sixties and still has not caught up with the demand for school facilities, despite the expenditure of $58 million on new construction in the last three years.

London Central High School is housed in a converted Air Force barracks. Rumor has it that Frankfurt, Jr. High was once a Nazi women's prison.

Frankfurt Elementary School No. 1 looks exactly like what it is: An outdated, rundown institution painted government gray. The floors are filthy, the water faucets leak and the kids are scrunched nose to nose like those cute little puppies you see in wire cages at the dog pound.

The school was built 24 years ago for 1,000 papers. Some of the teachers just seem to skim over the top to get you by. In some classes, about all you have to do is show up every day."

ARE THE SCHOOLS GOOD OR BAD?

The debate was a minor episode, a small part of the classwork required of Marleah and her fellow students. But it is an example of the problems faced by the schools operated in Europe for the sons and daughters of American military people.

The results of a four-month investigation of the dependents school system in Europe by the Times magazine indicate that the failure of school administrators to plan and evaluate their academic programs adversely affects the educational growth of military children.

The school system has no educational objectives or academic standards. Its program of standardized tests has been poorly administered and has shown inconclusive results. Therefore, school administrators have no systematic way to monitor the academic growth of their pupils and gauge the effectiveness of their educational programs.

The lack of educational planning and minimum standards of achievement in the dependents school system means that many teachers and students are left to "do their own thing" in the classrooms with decidedly mixed results.

The purpose of the dependents school system in Europe is to provide military children with educational opportunities that are "of high quality . . . comparable in all respects to the better school systems of the United States," according to Department of Defense directives.

Many parents and teachers in Europe believe the schools fail to meet that goal. In interviews with the Times magazine they talked about teachers who hand out "A's" and "B's" like playing cards, principals who say pupils should not be required to take basic academic courses they don't want and partments opened schools around the world. Most were—and still are—in the European area. Last year there were 211 schools and 110,452 students in Europe compared to 57 schools and 30,557 students in the Atlantic and Pacific areas combined.

For nearly 22 years, the Army, Navy and Air Force each operated the schools on their own bases. In 1968, the Secretary of Defense signed a directive that organised the schools into a single, unified school system under the Department of Defense (DoD).

The military departments were not out of the picture, however. The new system was divided into three school districts along geographical lines and the service with the most money and manpower in each district was to build the schools and supply them. The Air Force took responsibility for schools in the Pacific, the Navy for schools in the Atlantic and the Army took over schools in Europe.

Academically, the schools would be run by a DoD director of dependents education in the Pentagon who would establish educational policy and develop a common curriculum. This was supposed to solve the myriad problems and parental complaints caused by such things as the 31 different reading programs which required different textbooks, different teaching aids and different methods of instruction. Unification was supposed to cut costs and enable military children to transfer from one overseas school to another without falling behind due to the maze of different educational programs.

But that is not what happened, at least not in Europe. The DoD Director of Dependents Education, Dr. Anthony Cardinale, never took control of academic programs there because the Army interpreted the new directive to mean that it would not only build and supply the schools but run them as well.

Cardinale could not communicate directly pupils. The enrollment last year was 1,600. Some teachers had 35 students in their classes, which is far too many by any standard.

Not all of the dependents schools are dilapidated. Upper Heyford High School in England is so new it has the smell of a Cadillac fresh off the assembly line. Its electronic lab, automative shop and home economics center bristle with brand new equipment. Unlike other dependents schools in Europe, Upper Heyford High has a lunch room large enough to feed all the children who go to school there.

EUROPE SCHOOLS: THE REPORTS WERE BAD

After years on its own, the school system in Europe is independent no longer. Following an investigation by the House Appropriations Committee, Congress in 1974 ordered DoD schools around the world unified once and for all.

The committee's 1973 report on the dependents schools in Europe criticised, among other things, the lack of effective counseling to prepare high school students for college and the "proliferation of ineffective curricula." Academic programs that had failed in some schools and should have been shelved were instead spread to still more schools, much like a contagious disease.

That report came hard on the heels of a damning report on the lack of effectiveness of the dependents school system in Europe published in 1973 by the Army Audit Agency (AAA).. The AAA report stated that certain educational programs were not effective "because they were not controlled closely enough by management."

The AAA found, for example, that achievement test scores were not analyzed by principals and teachers and that the tests were not used to improve the academic growth of military children.

In one high school, Army auditors selected 83 students who had attended overseas schools for one year or more and compared their achievement test results to their intelligence test results. The auditors said in their report: "We found that 63 of these students were achieving below their ability in one or more of the six areas (such as reading, math, and science) covered by the achievement test."

The poor showing by the 63 students was "an indication that the educational program at the school was not fully effective. . . . If test results had been analyzed, this problem could have been detected," according to the AAA report.

To obtain better management of educational programs for military children, Congress took budget authority for the schools away from the military departments and gave it to DoD effective July 1 this year. From an organizational standpoint, the schools are right back where they started in 1968. Only this time, Congress intends to make the unification stick.

Cardinale, who kept his title all along, is now director of all dependents schools in fact as well as in name. Mason, director of dependents schools in Europe, now reports to Cardinale instead of to the commander of the U.S. Army in Europe. Cardinale has begun organizing the school system's academic programs and plans to give regular achievement tests in all schools beginning in September 1977.

The reports on the schools by the House Appropriations Committee and the AAA were soon followed by a third evaluation, this one published in September 1974 by the General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress. It read much like the first two reports, saying that educational programs are poorly managed and that efforts to evaluate the quality of education provided by dependents schools in Europe "have been sporadic and inadequately coordinated and monitives—general lists of topics in each subject area to be covered at each grade level.

This and other criticisms expressed here might apply in varying degrees to other school systems as well. The problem with the dependents school system in Europe is that its administrators have an apparent affection for the status quo. They have been told repeatedly over the years that their educational programs are weak but, as we shall see, have done little about it.

WHAT—AND HOW—SHOULD TEACHERS TEACH

A school superintendent without a standard set of curriculum objectives is like a warring general without an attack plan. Both need a way to tell their people what ground they are expected to cover.

Teachers in the States use curriculum objectives to plan their classwork and keep a running check on what their pupils are learning.

In Montgomery County, Md., Public Schools (considered one of the better school systems in the U.S.), for example, one of the 21 general objectives in third grade math is that children should be able to divide two-place dividends by a one-digit number—"Okay, kids, what's 18 divided by 3?" The list of objectives is an indication to teachers that most of their students should master those skills before the year is out.

Each child in Montgomery County has a check-off chart on the basic skills. Teachers use the chart to keep track of what each student learns. The chart is a part of each child's permanent record and follows him from one grade to the next.

That way, Johnny's new teacher can read the chart in September and get a good idea of how much he doesn't know. That's important because the simple knowledge that the 30 children in Miss Custer's class are all in the third grade means little. Some may be at the fifth grade level in reading and at But many teachers didn't like the idea, according to Knapp. "They thought it would take away from their flexibility in the classroom," he said. "But that's not true. Objectives are a guideline of what to teach. Each teacher decides how to put the material across."

An art teacher is Wiesbaden said, "We have a course outline but it's old, old, old. I think it was written in 1956. There's not a lot of planning going on around here."

Bonnie Giles, a fourth grade teacher at Wuersberg Elementary School, said, "The curriculum is based on nothing. You never build on what the child learned the previous year. Learning is not reinforced and we're not taking the child one more step at each grade level."

Audrey Haynes, a teacher for 13 years including three in dependents schools, said, "In Cleveland, we had curriculum objectives and the teachers met to plan what they wanted to accomplish. But here, every teacher does his own thing. We stay in our classrooms, in our own self-contained little worlds."

WHY SCIENCE TEACHING IS MISSING

Most elementary teachers interviewed admitted they do little science teaching. Traditionally, elementary teachers are weak in science and tend to shy away from the subject, so a strong curriculum is needed.

To provide it, school administrators in Europe purchased a prepackaged science program developed by the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS).

The AAAS program has been successful in other school systems, but in the dependents schools it bombed.

The failure of AAAS—and the waste of $750,000 it cost—is a prime example of how the lack of educational planning in the dependents school system adversely affects itored and have shown inconclusive results."

WHAT SHOULD YOU "GET OUT OF SCHOOL?"

That was two years ago. What have school administrators done to correct problems of the past? How effective are the dependents schools in Europe today? To find out, I visited 14 schools in Germany and England and interviewed 182 people—educators, students and parents—in Europe and Washington.

Some of those interviewed wanted more order and discipline in the schools. Others—parents and teachers alike—wanted "more basics." But most had one thing in common. They were after that slippery, vaporous prize sought by almost everyone concerned about good teaching—"a quality education." Yet finding a solid definition of that phrase is as likely as catching a black cat in a thick fog.

The educators and parents of children in the dependents schools face the same basic questions as their counterparts in the States: What should one "get" out of school? What is the best way to provide it? And what is a reliable way to check and see what kind of job the schools are doing?

Dr. Louis G. Zeyen, deputy director of the American Association of School Administrators in Arlington, Va., said, "For successful teaching, you must begin with four essentials. You've got to have an idea of the abilities of your students, an established set of curriculum objectives, a text and a method of measuring your results."

The administrators of the dependents school system in Europe have failed to provide those four essentials. They have no organizational plan that encourages good teaching. Instead, Mason and his subordinates have produced an educational free-for-all.

They have long overlooked a basic precept of education: That school systems should have a standard set of curriculum objectives the second grade level in math. Different children with different parents and different backgrounds learn at different rates. That's why curriculum objectives are important. They are an outline of what most children should learn at a given grade level.

But the dependents school system in Europe has no such minimum standard. As a result, some subjects are virtually ignored in many classrooms while course work in others is needlessly repeated. Principals and teachers have only the foggiest notion of what their students learn from one grade to the next.

When asked about her science curriculum, a teacher at Wuerzberg Elementary School replied, "Oh, I hit it a lick every now and then. The administration hasn't sent us a thing on science in years. Sometimes I borrow a science book from a teacher down the hall and type up some lessons." What about history? "I ad lib it," said the teacher. "We didn't have any books this year."

Dick Knapp, a fifth grade teacher at Frankfurt Elementary School No. 1, is slim and short and dresses in muted browns. He has short brown hair, blue eyes and still bounces with enthusiasm for teaching despite his conclusion that doing a good job at Frankfurt is nigh on to impossible.

"Teaching here is really different," said Knapp. "When I first got here, I had no workbooks and no materials. The only thing I had for my class was a few torn-up textbooks. I had never taught fifth grade before so I looked around for a guideline of what should be covered. There was none. We have no structure here, no continuity. In teaching, you've got to have building blocks; you've got to present the material in sequence. In American History, we teach the same thing in the fifth grade as we do in the sixth grade."

Knapp was soon named chairman of the school's curriculum development committee and began pushing for a set of objectives the education of military children.

Basically, the AAAS program consists of a teacher's guide and student kits designed to use a series of experiments to teach children about the processes of scientific inquiry. It is a new and somewhat complex approach to science teaching.

The first requirement of AAAS or any other prepackaged course is to train the teachers how to use it. Dependents schools administrators sought to do that by inviting a comparative few elementary teachers to attend voluntary AAAS workshops on their own time. According to many teachers interviewed, there were not enough workshops and the instruction in those that were held was sketchy at best.

However, Dr. Allen Dale Olson, community relations coordinator for the dependents school system in Europe, said, "The AAAS workshops were fairly widespread. The company that sold us the kits provided a training service. They teamed up with our curriculum people and visited the schools on an invitational basis."

Regardless of the number of workshops, many teachers who received the AAAS program didn't know how to use it. Those who did use the program said they were never resupplied with the items needed for student experiments, therefore the AAAS kits soon became useless.

In contrast to the dependents school system, in-service training for AAAS science in the Dade County, Fla., school system consisted of weekly classes throughout the school year. Teachers also were offered a 15-hour crash course in AAAS. "You couldn't say that we required teachers to attend, but they were strongly advised to take the course and most did," said Harriet Ehrhardt, consultant on science education to Dade County Schools.

The Dade County program has met with considerable success. In dependents schools, it was obvious by 1974 that the AAAS program had failed. What have school administrators replaced it with? "Nothing," said Barbara Rudometkin, a fifth grade teacher at Karlsruhe Elementary School. "There's practically no science teaching done in my class or in any other elementary class."

Her principal, Fred Mossinger, said, "Science is our weakest subject. The responsibility for the science curriculum has been laid on the individual teacher."

As a result, when children in dependents schools enter junior high school, "They don't know an ant from a centipede," said Carol Stopplecamp, a seventh grade science teacher at London Central High School. "They [elementary schools] are spending too much time on frills. My boy is in the fourth grade and he has four hours of swimming every Friday."

An elementary teacher in the Amberg, Germany, schools said, "When I was a seventh grade science teacher I always wondered why the kids came into class knowing nothing about science. Now I know why. There is no science teaching in the elementary schools. I'm a biology teacher, but I still need a guide to teach science."

WHY THE SCHOOLS HAVE NO STANDARDIZED CURRICULUM

The administrative staff at the dependents schools central office in Karlsruhe, Germany, includes 14 curriculum coordinators who supposedly help plan educational programs and introduce them into the schools. Yet Mason's method of developing curriculum objectives—a chief function of management—was to tell the principals of each school to form a committee and write their own. Had all the schools done so—some didn't—the dependents school system would have ended up with 211 different educational programs.

Mason, director of schools in Europe, believes that having a standard curriculum for all schools would be a disservice to some pupils.

dependents school system in Europe over what should be taught in the classrooms and how the academic curriculum should be presented.

The debate centers around the decision by school system administrators to permit secondary schools to reduce the number of required basic courses in English and social science. Over the last decade, about 25 of the 37 dependents high schools and many junior high schools have replaced their required courses in those two subjects with electives.

The switch to electives reflected a fundamental shift in educational philosophy. The freedom to choose became a priority in many dependents schools in Europe. To accommodate that priority, the dependents school system three years ago reduced its graduation requirement from four years of English to three so that pupils could take minority studies and more electives, such as art and music, that they would enjoy.

The reduction was made in the face of hard evidence that the ability of dependents school students (and those across the nation) to read and write was on the decline.

The way to stop that decline, some believe, is to concentrate on the essentials of reading, writing and arithmetic.

According to many teachers and parents the Times Magazine interviewed, the electives system does not provide students with enough instruction in the skills crucial to academic development: reading, grammar, mechanics of writing and vocabulary building. And as a result, schools which use electives some times fail to deliver on their fundamental promise to parents: To teach their children how to read a simple article and write a lucid paragraph.

In a series of three resolutions passed last May, the PTSA declared that military children "are not being provided enough instruction in the basics" and demanded that

The principal of Upper Heyford High School, David L. Schlesinger, said, "We're taking a hard look at our electives English program. Teachers in other departments become very concerned when they find the kids can't read and write."

Karen West, a junior at Nuremberg High School, said, "I liked the old way of teaching better. You could learn more. All my friends dodge the harder courses and so do I. My English teacher is really great though. He cares about whether you learn or not."

Her teacher, James H. Mulder, said it once was true that students could pick and choose courses, but that grammar and composition courses have been added in the seventh and eighth grades. Nuremberg will stick with the electives approach, however.

Many teachers in dependents schools say electives work because teenagers who select their own courses and instructors are more interested in their classwork and more receptive to good teaching.

For some people, that's true. The wife of an Army sergeant with a daughter in Nuremberg High School said, "Sherry gets to select her own books now and she's reading lots better."

Karen Beckler, 16, who attended Frankfurt High School for more than a year and now lives in Gwinn, Mich., said electives made school more interesting "because you get to pick your own courses and change classes a lot [every nine weeks]. When I got back to the States, it was the old grind. Everything is taught right out of the book."

Gibbons, language arts coordinator for the school system, said one advantage of electives is that teachers specialize in a single subject instead of teaching grammar, composition and literature in a year-long required course.

"Ultimately, it's not the way you organize the curriculum that counts," Gibbons said. "It's the quality of the teacher and I do not

Mason said, "In some of the schools near our headquarters areas, most of the children want to go to college. In other areas where you have a high concentration of troops, few of the children want to go to college. That is my concern. How can you have a standard curriculum for every school?"

However, many educators and parents the Times Magazine interviewed believe children should be taught the same basic skills regardless of whether they want to be plumbers or engineers.

Dr. Joan M. Gibbons, curriculum coordinator of language arts (English) for the dependents school system in Europe, said teachers know "where the kids are [academically]" and can best decide what curriculum objectives are needed. "You change your curriculum to meet the needs of your students," said Gibbons. "We sometimes have complete shifts in missions at various posts. Our student populations keep changing."

That is precisely why other educators believe curriculum objectives should be systemwide. Dr. Gordon Cawelti, executive director of the nationwide Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development in Washington, D.C., said standardized objectives "are especially important for military children who move around a lot."

And in a resolution passed at its annual meeting last May, the 31,000-member European Parent-Teacher and Student Association (PTSA) called for the dependents school system in Europe to standardize curriculum objectives. It did this because "A wide variation of course content in individual subjects exists even within a single school . . . [which] can be detrimental" to the education of military children who often are transferred from one dependents' school to another.

THE ELECTIVES DEBATE: FUN VS. TOUGH COURSES

The PTSA resolution is part of a sharp and sometimes angry debate being waged in the Mason order the schools to abandon electives in favor of a traditional English curriculum in which students "are exposed to comprehensive instruction in the mechanics and technique" of effective writing.

Educators and teachers critical of the electives system say it doesn't work because students skip from one course to the next like so many butterflies in a daisy field, missing much of the instruction they would receive in a program of required courses.

These critics believe students select fun courses such as drama rather than tough courses such as composition, that most teenagers are unable to do the long-range planning necessary to select the courses they need and that the academic curriculum is not presented in a logical sequence.

Nancy McGee, an English teacher at Wuerzburg High School, said, "There comes a time when you have to explain that a sentence starts with a capial letter and ends with a period. Then you teach them how to write an essay."

Sonia Zenk, who last year was executive vice president of the PTSA and had two sons in Frankfurt High School, said, "We have children taking 'Humor in the Media' who don't know how to write a good paragraph. They take grammer in the last quarter of the ninth grade rather than the first quarter of the seventh grade. The elective system just doesn't work."

Some educators in Europe agree and are cutting back on electives. John G. Korslund, principal of Wuersburg High School, said, "A few years ago there was a swing toward more innovative practices, but we're not really doing right in neglecting the basics. There must be a certain amount of grammar and spelling. This year, we had schoolwide spelling bees for the first time in years."

Korslund is adding required English classes at the seventh and eighth grade level and offering more remedial courses for high school students "who aren't proficient in English."

believe for one minute that the basics have been neglected" in dependents schools.

DO ELECTIVES MEAN POOR SCORES?

However, almost every available measure of academic achievement indicates that the ability of high school students to read and write has been declining for more than a decade.

The national average score on the verbal portion of the Scholastic Aptitude Test (taken by most college-bound students) has shown a steady decline over the last 12 years. Recent studies by the National Assessment of Educational Progress show that the essays of 13 and 17-year-olds are far more awkward and disorganized than the efforts of those tested in 1969. The studies also showed that the writing ability of nine-year-olds had improved compared to 1969. And in an investigation of declining academic achievement in the nation's colleges and schools, Los Angeles Times reporters Jack McCurdy and Don Speich found that, "It is the fundamental and massive shift from basic academic requirements to an array of electives that seem to be the most direct contributor to the achievement decline in schools and colleges."

McCurdy and Speich examined results from the Graduate Record Examination taken by most college graduates bound for graduate school and found that: "In areas where electives have blossomed, such as the social sciences, the scores have dropped sharply. Conversely, in the natural sciences where there are more requirements and fewer electives, scores have risen."

What about students in the dependents schools? Have their reading abilities declined also? Do they write better or worse than military children who sat in the same classrooms three years ago? The answer is that nobody knows for sure. Neither the teachers nor principals nor Mason himself can demonstrate with any degree of certainty whether or not the dependents schools are effective. The dependents school system does not systematically monitor student achievement in such basic skills as reading and math. Most large school systems in the States use standardized tests to measure student progress in the basics and spot weaknesses in their academic programs.

For example, Dr. Roberta Keiter, coordinator of testing for Montgomery County Public Schools, said, "About six years ago, our overall score on the language arts portion of the tests fell to the 42d percentile [meaning 58 percent of students in a national sample scored higher than Montgomery County students]. And we found it was the way the curriculum was being implemented. They were teaching all this creative stuff in the schools. You know, do your own thing. It was all literature, poetry and drama and nothing to reinforce the English skills. We had to tell them to knock it off."

THE SCHOOLS ADOPT AN ELECTIVE APPROACH TO MANDATORY TESTING

The dependents schools began a mandatory program of standardized tests in 1969 using the Iowa Tests of Basic Skills (ITBS) which measure scholastic achievement in English, math and study skills. The ITBS currently is used by school systems in Houston, Milwaukee and dozens more cities across the country.

The testing program in dependents schools didn't last long, however. When students tested low in certain English and math skills in 1969 and 1970, school administrators in Europe failed to take a hard look at their educational programs to see what, if anything, was wrong. Instead, they simply cancelled the tests in violation of DoD regulations that made the testing program mandatory. DoD officials later suspended the testing program.

In 1974, the suspension was lifted and students in a sample of schools were given the ITBS. Once again, the results were disquent moves [by military children] from one school to another," Coffman said.

The lowest achievement scores were in math. Most dependents schools teach modern math concepts which were not covered by the regular ITBS at that time. When a special modern math supplement to the ITBS was given to 1300 students after the first test results came back in 1969, math scores rose.

Test results from 1974 suggest there still may be a relatively low performance in math problem solving which is covered by the regular ITBS.

However, the comparison of average performance of students in dependents schools to a national sample in any particular year is of little meaning, according to Coffman. What is important is that "by comparing test performance of one year with performances in previous years—or performance on one subject with that in other subjects—[teachers and principals] can begin to formulate educated guesses about what is happening to pupils in the school system."

Used effectively, test results can help teachers and counselors determine the academic level of each pupil and plan their students' classes around the subject they need most. This is especially important in schools that use the elective system.

But that kind of planning doesn't happen in the dependents school system. The students were tested in only four of the last seven years. And in 1974 and 1975, the tests were given in only 20 percent of the schools.

WITHOUT STANDARDS, FEW STUDENTS ARE FAILED

In the interviews with the Times Magazine, several principals admitted they don't know the reading levels of their high school seniors and have no clear idea of what and how much their pupils are learning.

Furthermore, it is impossible to tell exactly what military children are required to had an active retention program, we would just retain the same kids every year. All you do is make the child feel like a loser."

But Lynne Holland, international president of the Overseas Education Association, the largest teacher's union in dependent schools, said the school system's policy against retention "simply promotes illiteracy."

"I'm certain you could come up with lots of empirical data on the emotional trauma suffered by a child who's retained," Holland said. "But compare that to the emotional damage done to a 16-year-old who's in high school and can't read. He's always at the bottom of his class and may be a disciplinary problem too."

An elementary teacher in Wiesbaden said, "If you have a slow learner in the first or second grade, that's the time to retain him. After that, it's too late. The decision is supposed to be made by a child study committee in each school. But even when parents want their own child retained, they [committee members] say, 'Oh, no, your child has an IQ of 130 and we wouldn't think of retaining him.' They talk the parents right out of it. And the child may be low in motivation and everything else."

Ann Hetherman, a social studies teacher at Frankfurt Jr. High School, said, "If the children are a certain age, they're supposed to be in a certain grade, so the [school] system just keeps moving them up. That's why they graduate from high school and still can't read."

In the dependents school system, the lack of academic standards has an obvious effect on some students.

Kenneth Griffith, a retired Army sergeant now living in Security, Colo., who returned to the States last March, said, "I had six kids in the Frankfurt schools and they're still trying to recover from the effects. Before we left, they were all good readers. Now appointing. In 1975, the same sample testing was done, and the results were the same as 1974—disappointing.

Test results from the dependents schools in Europe were not made available to parents, as is done in many Stateside school systems. But Mason, director of dependents schools in Europe, occasionally announces the results himself. In a speech last May to the European PTSA, for example, he claimed test scores of students in dependents schools compared favorably with the national average.

That is not completely true. Available test results indicate that average scores from dependents high schools in Europe were usually above the national average while average scores from elementary schools were generally below it (see story on page 40).

In 1969 and 1970, the DoD testing program included a series of intelligence tests. Therefore, educators could measure the difference between ability, as measured by the intelligence tests, and achievement, as measured by the ITBS.

At the request of The Times Magazine, all available test results were reviewed by Dr. William E. Coffman, professor of educational measurement at the University of Iowa, and director of the statewide testing program in Iowa.

Coffman said intelligence test scores indicate that pupils in the overseas schools "appear to be at least as able and possibly a bit more able" than pupils in a national sample of students tested by the Houghton Mifflin Co., which publishes the tests.

However, low achievement scores from the ITBS in 1969 and 1970 indicate that "the achievement of pupils was not quite as high as one might reasonably expect" on the basis of intelligence tests, Coffman said.

To find out why achievement scores were low, "One would look at factors in the school situation [such as] the nature of the curriculum, the quality of teaching or the freelearn. The dependents school system has no academic standards. Students are not required to demonstrate proficiency in English, math or anything else. They are promoted from grade to grade and given high school diplomas regardless of their ability to read a book, write an essay or perform basic arithmetic computations. A diploma is little more than a certificate of attendance.

The dependents school system has no grading criteria or standard grading symbols. The "A" math student in one class may be no more proficient than the "C" student down the hall. And without educational goals or system-wide tests or academic standards, neither parents nor educators can differentiate between the two.

Some civilian school systems, worried about declining achievement, are toughening up. In Los Angeles, students must pass a proficiency test in reading before they can graduate from high school. A new Florida law requires proficiency tests in grades three, five, eight and 11. All who fail are given remedial tutoring at state expense.

Students in Maryland must pass proficiency tests every year from the second grade on. Those who fail are retained in grade or receive special help. he school system in Denver, Colo., long has required pupils to pass proficiency tests in English and math before they graduate.

Those who fail receive a certificate of attendance, not a diploma. In years past, proficiency was determined by the classroom teacher. Students who did adequate work were promoted and those who didn't were retained in grade. But it's standing policy in the dependents school system that children may not be retained without permission of the parents and a child study committee. That is the conventional wisdom among most educators today. Few children are held back. Many believe retention does more harm than good. Fred Mossinger, principal of Karlsruhe Elementary School in Germany, said, "If we half of them are in remedial reading because they fell behind overseas.

"And they didn't have much to do in class. They rarely had homework and that hurts. They picked up a lot of bad study habits that they have to get rid of."

An administrator for Army schools at Fort Knox, Ky., said, "The elementary children that come here from Germany have a hard time keeping up. They're reading way below grade level. There's been a downhill trend over the last five years."

DESPITE THEIR FAULTS, THE SCHOOLS HAVE THEIR GOOD POINTS

Despite the lack of educational planning in the dependents school system in Europe, the schools have their good points. The system's minority studies program was described by several teachers as second to none. The school system has a strong host nation program in which foreign nationals conduct courses—complete with field trips—about the culture of their country.

Many observers, including the investigative staff of the House Appropriations Committee which evaluated the school system three years ago, have said there are many excellent teachers in the schools. In allowing each school to decide its own objectives and curriculum, Mason, director of dependents schools in Europe, clearly relied on a generally strong teaching staff to develop solid educational programs for military children. Many did.

Zee Spain, a teacher at Wuerzberg Elementary School, developed her own science curriculum, keeps a weekly record of what her pupils learn and sends a report home to parents every Friday. Her teaching methods are burdensome and take extra time, but she thinks the results are worth it.

Two teachers at Wiesbaden Elementary School, Cheryl Peterson and Suzanne Sackett, knocked out a wall in an old classroom to make two large rooms where three had existed. They worked for weeks to develop their own curriculum in every subject area.

Mornings, Peterson and Sackett's children are grouped according to their abilities for three hours of language arts and math. Afternoons, the children learn by doing. They plant seeds to see how things grow, visit a farm to learn how animals are born and inspect the sewer plant and fire station on base to find out how things work.

At first, the parents were horrified. They wanted their children at their desks reciting their lessons. But Peterson and Sackett gradually won them over. They now have a waiting list of parents who want their children in the program.

As I followed two boys down the hall at Nuremberg High School, one chortled that he had just rewritten an article out of Newsweek and handed it in as his own work. His friend said, "Bet you wouldn't try that in Miss Boerchinger's class." When I asked why not, the student said, "She's tough, man. Tough, but fair"—high praise from any 16-year-old.

Mary Boerschinger, chairperson of the social science department, said, "The first thing I tell my students when they enter this class is that everyone has the right to fail." I met lots of other teachers who seemed just as demanding.

Dr. Jerald E. Bloom, principal of Frankfurt High School, said most parents don't care about standardized tests or how the curriculum is organized. "What they care about is can they get their kids into college," he said. "And at this school, the answer is yes; we graduated 400 in June and 45 percent of them will show up at the college door." Bloom keeps a chart showing that many of his graduates are accepted at the military academies, Ivy League schools and state universities across the nation. He said, "The colleges look favorably on our students."

an unlimited number of days without penalty. When asked why, Dr. Dichard H. Coss, who until July was deputy director of the dependents school system in Europe, replied, "That's a dumb question." Asked why it was dumb, Coss said, "Well, it just is."

How naive. I found out about the lack of attendance requirements because one teacher after another complained during interviews that all too many parents yank their kids out of school for a three-week tour of the Rhine or a trip to sunny Spain.

When the students return, they won't make up the work, their parents won't make them, and there is little the teachers can do about it. In the dependents schools, promotion to the next grade is as certain as the sunrise, and the kids know it.

COMING NEXT ISSUE

As will be reported in the second of two articles about dependents schools in the next issue of the Times Magazine, the problems faced by educators, parents and students overseas do not end with poorly planned curriculums.

An investigation of the school system by the Times magazine shows that some military children go to school in veritable slum conditions and that many teachers are hampered by a serious shortage of textbooks and supplies they need to do their jobs.

In addition, the Times Magazine will explore the complaints of principals who say they cannot remove incompetent teachers from the classrooms.

We also will take a look at the high school dormitories—home to scores of military children whose parents are stationed far from the schools. And we will examine the policies and personality of Dr. Anthony Cardinale, the new director of DOD dependents schools around the world.

DEPENDENTS SCHOOLS IN EUROPE: A DIS-crowded and that principals are unable to fire the few incompetent teachers in Europe.

In addition, our investigation found that the instructional materials that are available are distributed unfairly. Some elementary school children in Frankfurt and Wiesbaden do without the texts and workbooks that children at another school in Germany, Karlsruhe Elementary School, take for granted.

Teachers said that when school funds are exhausted or classroom materials fail to arrive, they sometimes buy supplies with their own money, depend on donations from NCO and officers wives clubs or obtain money from the European Parent-Teacher and Student Association (PTSA).

WHY CAN'T THEY GET BOOKS?

The lack of books and supplies is caused in part by long supply lines and poor coordination between the dependents school system in Europe and the Defense General Supply Center (DGSC) in Richmond, Va.

The 211 dependents schools in Europe are located in 12 countries and spread over 9.5 million square miles, an area more than twice the size of the United States. In addition, school books and other instructional materials have a low priority for military shipment to Europe. These two factors combined often are responsible for the late delivery of teaching materials to the classrooms.

Last summer, for example, 70 tons of books and supplies sat for weeks in warehouses on the East Coast awaiting shipment to dependent schools in Europe. Gen. George S. Blanchard, commander of the U.S. Army in Europe, learned of the delay in August and ordered the materials airlifted to Germany on an emergency basis. Nevertheless, some did not arrive in the schools until after classes began this fall.

Proof, he believes, that his school is as good as any.

WHY THE EUROPEAN SCHOOLS ARE "FUN CITY" FOR STUDENTS

The dependents school system in Europe has some good programs and some excellent teachers.

But the failure of its administrators to plan and evaluate their curriculums and establish minimum standards of achievement for teachers and students has resulted in the near total absence of a science curriculum in elementary schools.

In addition, the low scorces on the English and math skills portions of the ITBS standardized tests cannot be explained away in view of intelligence test results that show dependents school system students are at least average in potential ability.

The tests are inconclusive, but they are a strong indication that school administrators should take a critical look at their educational programs.

In the past, school administrators have failed to do that. A 1970 analysis of test results showed that the ability of dependents schools pupils in grades one through eight to read and write was declining. One year later school administrators began to water down their high school graduation requirement in English so that students could take more electives they might like.

What's important to school administrators, it seems, is not what the children learn in school but how much they enjoy it.

Perhaps the school system's level of concern about academic standards is best exemplified by its attendance requirements. There aren't any. In most states, it is a law that school children have to go to school. In Alexandria, Va., public schools, for instance, students who miss more than 25 days must make up the work or stay back a grade.

But students in overseas schools may miss

ORGANIZED SYSTEM IN DANGER OF FLUNKING

(By Richard C. Barnard)

As she carefully opened the cardboard box and pushed it slowly across the table toward me, the young woman with light blonde hair, blue eyes and a doleful expression on her face said, You see, sometimes the box comes in December and sometimes it doesn't come until April or May. And when it finally gets here, you open it up and find only half of what you wanted."

She sounded like a disappointed child complaining that Santa is never good to her at Christmas. In fact, the young woman was a teacher at Frankfurt Jr. High School explaining why she often does without the materials she needs to help educate the sons and daughters of American military people.

Other teachers overseas face the same problem.

The results of THE TIMES MAGAZINE's investigation of the dependents school system in Europe indicate that its supply system operates only slightly better than its academic programs.

The school system has no educational objectives, or academic standards. As a result, many students and teachers are left to "do their own thing" in the classrooms with decidedly mixed results. The failure of school administrators in Europe to plan and evaluate their academic programs adversely affects the educational growth of military children (see THE TIMES MAGAZINE Oct. 18, 1976).

In addition, interviews with students and educators in Europe indicate that teachers often receive classroom materials when the school year is almost over rather than before it begins and that some schools frequently run out of such basic supplies as toilet paper, scissors and chalk.

The parents, educators and students interviewed by THE TIMES MAGAZINE also said that many school buildings are rundown and over-as reading booklets and test tubes are ordered through a cumbersome four-step process. Orders placed by each teacher are sent to the dependents schools administration office in Karlsruhe, Germany. From there, they go to the Defense General Supply Center in Richmond and then to book publishers and suppliers. DGSC keeps no classroom materials in stock.

In a 1976 review of management problems in dependents schools, Christopher T. Cross, minority aide to the House Committee on Education and Labor, found that communications between the school system and DGSC "seem to be poor and apparently result in some funds being turned back because ordered equipment was not available and the schools were not told to place other orders."

In an interview with the Times magazine, Cathy Silver, a fourth grade teacher at Wuerzburg Elementary School, said that last year she ordered her reading texts and workbooks months ahead of time. The texts came nine weeks after the beginning of school, but the workbooks never arrived.

In addition to long supply lines and poor coordination with DGSC, Dr. Joseph A. Mason, director of schools in Europe, said that in late May he had received only $2.4 million for books, supplies and maintenance "instead of the $8 to $10 million normally required."

His press spokesman, Dr. Allen Dale Olson, said in September that the school system was still severely short of money for books and supplies.

However, Dr. Anthony Cardinale, director of DoD dependents schools worldwide (and Mason's boss), said the dependents schools in Europe have adequate funds to buy the books and instructional materials needed.

"I sat down with Dr. Mason and his supply people in early May," said Cardinale. "They said they needed $300,000 to cover the costs of outstanding orders for books. I released $500,000. At the end of May, I released another $500,000. Half of that was for books."

In August, Mason received an advance credit of $1.4 million to purchase books and instructional materials for the school year that began in September, Cardinale said.

However, the dependents school system in Europe receives less money than many of the larger school systems in the States, according to a cost-comparison prepared by Cardinale's staff.

Last year, the school system's budget of about $147 million amounted to $1273 for each student. In comparison, the Montgomery County, Md., school system spent $1710 per student while Baltimore spent $1318. Arlington, Va., spent $1771 on each student, and Washington, D.C., spent $1378, according to the school system's analysis.

The cost comparison also showed that 20 of the larger school systems in the U.S. averaged $1687 per student. The school system in Europe had far less money to educate its students than many school systems across the nation."

"WE CALL IT THE BAKE SALE SCHOOL SYSTEM"

Regardless of the amount of money available this year, a shortage of books, instructional materials and supplies has long been a chroic problem for the dependents school system in Europe.

Last May, for example, lack of funds forced administrators at Illesheim Elementary School (which has grades one through eight) to cancel plans to offer a "hands on" science program in the seventh and eighth grades that involved almost daily lab work.

Frankfurt Elementary School No. 1 is one of the largest dependents schools in Europe. Yet its total budget last year for classroom materials—from textbooks to pencils—was $16,000.

"That's an example of why we call this the bake sale school system," said a teacher the Overseas Education Association, the largest teachers union in dependents schools, said, "The basic problem is the supply system here. The military supply people will let you know right quick that their first job is to support the Army's mission. The schools come second."

Though some schools in Europe sometimes run short of books and supplies, that is not true of all dependents schools. Prior to July 1, when dependents schools were unified into a single school system, schools in the Pacific were operated by the Air Force and those in Europe were run by the Army.

Several parents and educators interviewed said the Air Force provided much better support to the schools than did the Army.

Libby Pierciey, an elementary teacher in Stuttgart, said, "When I taught in Okinawa, the Air Force gave us all kinds of supplies and materials that are considered not essential in Europe. Remedial reading texts, for example, are hard to find here, but we had plenty in the Pacific."

WHY ARE SCHOOL FACILITIES SO ANCIENT?

During the winter months, the faculty and students at Nuremberg High School look like studio extras for *M*A*S*H*, the TV show about the wacky adventures of an Army medical unit in Korea.

At Nuremberg, teachers and students on the bottom floor of the school wear their overcoats in the classroom while those on the top floor open the windows to avoid heat prostration.

An erratic heating system is only one of the problems faced by faculty and students at Nuremberg High.

The hallways and classrooms are littered with trash. The electrical wiring is so bad that when one teacher plugs in a movie projector, the lights in nearby classrooms dim and sometimes go out.

The library reading room is out in the completed in 1974, the urinals were built too high for the elementary-age children.

As a result of the slow pace of construction, many dependents schools in Europe are rundown and overcrowded. Lindsey Elementary School in Wiesbaden is housed in an ancient barracks. Last year, several teachers there had 38 pupils in their classes.

The school was so crowded that some single "classrooms" consisted of two small rooms with a door in between, a situation which forced teachers to dodge from room to room in order to keep watch over their students.

Erma Hayes, a social worker at the school, said, "Don't ask me how they teach with all those kids in one little classroom. When a child in the back of the room wants to leave, you have to move the desks so he can get out. It's tragic."

Army Lt. Col. Theodore H. Taylor, chief of personnel and community affairs at Wiesbaden, said, "It's true that there were 38 kids in a class at the beginning of the year. But that was due to a shortage of teachers. We got more teachers within a few weeks and the problem was alleviated."

SOME STUDENTS LIVE IN DORMITORIES

"The facilities here are okay," said Turney Moore, chief counselor at the dormitory at Frankfurt High School. "One of the biggest problems here is that some military families arrive [in Europe] to find out they have to give up their kids for an entire year. Some of them are bitter about it and I don't blame them."

In the dependents school system in Europe, there are 10 high schools with adjoining dormitories. Students in the ninth through 12th grades who live more than one hour's commuting distance from school must live in the dorms Monday through Friday. The Army provides transportation to and from school on weekends.

However, high school students who live at the school. "Back in the States, you sell brownies to buy uniforms for the basketball team or horns for the band. Here you do it to buy the basic stuff you need in the classroom.

"Some of the parents are wonderful, but most don't support the school. We have 1,600 kids here but only 40 or 50 parents show up at PTA meetings. Those are the people we depend on and they can give us only so much money and eat only so many brownies."

Several schools in Europe depend on donations from parents to buy library books, reading books, art supplies and underwrite the salaries of a handful of teachers and teachers' aides. At Frankfurt Elementary No. 2, money contributed by parents last year was used to pay the salary of a physical education teacher.

A sixth grade teacher at the school said, "When I walked into class last year, all I had was one set of math books. The covers were gone and some had pages missing.

"We had no reading books—none! So the kids and I decided to buy our own. We sold popcorn until it was coming out of people's ears and bought the Reader's Digest reading kit for $485."

In addition to textbooks and instructional materials, many teachers and principals interviewed said some schools occasionally run short of basic supplies.

"When I taught in Nuremberg, we got two pieces of chalk each year," said an elementary teacher. "We had no Scotch tape, no tacks and no scissors. We just didn't get the basic things you need for a classroom."

The schools buy their basic supplies at local Army supply stores, which are not always well stocked. At a few bases, military supply sergeants get first pick of available supplies and school supply clerks get what's left.

Lynne Holland, international president of hallway. Students who study there are sometimes disrupted by others who use the hall to get to art class. The equipment and tables in the library's tiny audio-visual study room are always covered with a fine layer of dirt simply because no one ever cleans them.

Nuremberg High is not typical of all dependents schools in Europe. Several of the schools are new. Six of the 14 schools I saw were clean and well-equipped. Though Karlsruhe Elementary School is housed in an older building, it is neat and well-run because the principal, Fred Mossinger, and local Army officials have worked hard to keep it that way. Five of seven teachers interviewed in that school described it as "a beautiful place to teach."

School administrators in Europe say that 80 percent of their school facilities are adequate, including Nuremberg High School, which indicates how dilapidated some schools are.

One reason why some schools in Europe are in sad shape is that the Army built no schools in the 1960's except those to replace school buildings vacated when DeGaulle kicked U.S. forces out of France. The Army still has not caught up with the demand for new school buildings despite the expenditure of $58 million on construction in the last three years.

Responsibility for the dependents schools in Europe is divided between DoD school administrators, who run the educational programs, and Army officials, who build the schools and maintain them.

One of the sillier consequences of this divided authority is that school principals in Europe have no power to tell the janitors in their own schools what to do. The janitors report to the local post facilities engineers, not to the principals.

Another consequence is that new schools are not built by the people who are going to use them, which sometimes causes problems. For instance, at Ramstein Elementary School, more than two hours commuting distance from school live in the dorms from September through June with vacations home only at Christmas and Easter. This year, about 900 of the roughly 21,500 high school students in Europe live in the dormitories.

For students in grades one through eight, the maximum commuting distance is 45 minutes. Families with grade school children who live further than that may send their children to private school at the Army's expense.

"But a problem in Germany is that there are only a handful of private schools that offer what might be called an American education," said Lee Bartley, administrative assistant to the director of DOD schools. Some grade school students who live far from school must make do with correspondence courses.

WHY INCOMPETENT TEACHERS CAN'T BE FIRED

During my interviews in Germany and England, I had a standard list of questions for the dozen or so principals I planned to interview.

And there was always one question that caused them to stop, lean toward me and say in a lowered voice: "I'll discuss that with you, but it'll have to be off the record."

The question was: "You must have a couple of incompetents on your staff—every school does. Why don't you fire them?"

Most principals said they had one or two teachers on their staffs who shouldn't be in the classroom, but that the school system's personnel rules made it impossible to get rid of them. This means that 200–400 of the 5600 teachers in Europe are viewed by principals as being incompetent.

One principal said, "To fire someone, you have to catch them doing something blatantly wrong. It has to be documented. The personnel rules, say that even when you have an obvious incompetent, you have to take a positive approach with him. You have to show that you've counseled the teacher about his shortcomings. That has to be documented too."

Most teachers acknowledged that principals have little power to fire them. A math department chairman said, "The only way they can fire me is if they get me on a morals charge."

The principal of an elementary school in Germany said that firing a teacher "is like preparing for trial. You've got to build a file on the guy. You give him a statement of charges. He gives you a rebuttal. Then there are appeal procedures all down the line. The union gets involved and the teacher may try to get the local IG [inspector general] on your back. Once you've been involved in something like that you'll never try again."

Union president Holland said, "It's not true that principals have no way to weed out incompetents. Six teachers were severed last year.

"Each teacher has a probationary period of three years. If administrators can't weed out incompetents by then, I question their ability to do their jobs at all.

"I question how much [principals] really desire to get involved in the process of evaluating and firing people. I question the quality of administrators [in the dependents school system in Europe].

"Our school system is rather unique in that you don't have to be certified as a principal in order to be hired as a principal. I would guess that 50 percent of our principals aren't certified."

The dependents school system in Europe has no certification standards for principals or teachers and keeps no record of who is certified.

Most state departments of education examine the college transcripts of prospective teachers and principals before certifying them as eligible for employment in the public schools.

Although most Stateside schools have testing programs, Europe schools do not. It is time for school administrators to provide military children a comprehensive testing program. That means, at the very least, giving aptitude tests and yearly achievement tests. Those test scores should be made available to parents, along with a clear explanation of what the scores mean.

It is time for the Army to get serious about modernizing the school facilities in Europe. In the Wiesbaden area, for example, several classes are conducted in attics and basements. Yet the Army's $25.5 billion budget this year includes a paltry $6.5 million for two elementary schools in Germany.

Parents don't have a say in how the schools are run. In Europe, the schools are organized into five school districts. The school system should have a school board in each one, with all positions elected. And perhaps there should be a big school board for all of the schools in Europe.

The boards should have authority for budget priorities. For instance, should available funds be spent for remedial reading books or remedial reading specialists? School boards also could decide on new school buildings and apply pressure on the Army and DoD to modernize existing facilities. The Army has been dragging its feet on facilities for decades.

In the States, parents have a voice—through elected school boards—in the operation of the schools their children attend. Military parents pay federal taxes which support the overseas schools. There is no reason why military parents should be disenfranchised simply because they're serving overseas.

The DoD director for dependents schools, Dr. Anthony Cardinale, has set up advisory boards. While this is a step in the right direction, it is not enough. The boards should Administrators, the Overseas Education Association, the European Congress of Parents, Teachers, and Students, and the Department of Defense. Simply speaking, the proposed transfer is endorsed by all the parties involved.

These schools are regular American public elementary and secondary schools serving the dependents of military personnel who are stationed abroad. Their purpose is to educate American children and is not integrally involved with the mission of the Department of Defense. We believe that the 135,000 students in these schools deserve the opportunity to benefit from the great educational resources of the new Education Department. If they remain under the jurisdiction of the Department of Defense, they will continue to be isolated from the rest of the educational arena in the United States.

We do not agree with the contention by the opponents of this transfer that the DOD overseas schools will become "test tubes" for the experimentation of unorthodox teaching methods. Anyone familiar with the DOD Overseas Schools recognizes that one of the great problems with the schools has been their failure to have minimum educational standards, updated teaching material and innovative techniques for the use of the teachers. It will be the function of the new Department of Education to provide this material and these techniques for the use of these overseas schools so that they can be on a par with educational systems in the United States. The Department of Education, however, will have the authority to provide this information, not impose it on the schools. The availability of such information should upgrade the quality of education for our American children overseas.

S. 991 does not take the schools off military bases. The DOD Schools will always re-

Dr. Anthony Cardinale, director of DOD dependents schools, wants to establish new employment standards and certify teachers and principals every five years. Those who can't meet the new standards would be dismissed under Cardinale's proposal.

However, any such program must be negotiated with the union.

Holland said, "Administrators have a right to evaluate us. Our concern is the procedures they use. I'm sure we can come up with something livable."

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

In the last two issues the Times magazine has examined the dependents school system in Europe. We found many weak areas, and a few bright spots. However, if the dependents schools intend to achieve their goal of top-quality education, they should take remedial action in certain parts of the system in Europe where quality is far short of the best.

As shown by our investigation, the dependents school system in Europe has a personnel system which promotes job security at the expense of professional competence in the classroom. The schools system should adopt new employment standards. It also should institute a certification program for teachers and principals.

The Europe schools system has no core curriculum in the basic academic skills. It has no minimum standards of achievement for teachers or students. And it has no systematic way to check on what kind of job each of the 211 schools is doing. One result of this is the appalling fact that teachers and principals in Europe do not have the slightest idea of how well (or poorly) their high school seniors can read.

It is time for school administrators to develop an administrative framework that encourages good teaching. And that means a core curriculum in the basic academic skills, such as reading, that every child needs, regardless of his or her life's goals.

be policymaking, not advisory. Parents should have a say in how money is spent. Money is power, and Cardinale controls the money, and the power.

Dr. Joseph A. Mason, chief of dependents schools in Europe, says parents have a voice in their children's education because they are allowed to sit on curriculum developemnt committees in most schools. But the practice is different from his pronouncements.

Most parents don't know about the curriculum development committees. And in some schools—London Central High School, for example—parent-members can come to committee meetings but they have no vote.

The dependents schools in Europe have come a long way since the postwar days of converted barracks and pioneer hardships. But when compared to many community school systems in the States, the dependents schools are an embarrassment.

Military children deserve better.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that a letter to our Senate colleagues from Senators Henry Jackson and Sam Nunn of the Armed Services Committee be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Committee on Armed Services,
Washington, D.C., September 26, 1978.

Dear Colleague: We want to communicate to you our opposition to the Schmitt Amendment (No. 3620) to the Department of Education bill (S. 991), which would delete the transfer of the Department of Defense Overseas Dependents Schools to the new Department.

This transfer was unanimously supported by the full Committee on Governmental Affairs and is supported by the Overseas School main an important part of the military community, and it is unrealistic to assume that, as a result of the transfer, parents would take their children out of the only American school in a foreign country. We share the support of the European PTSA for the transfor on the grounds that the schools will fare much better in an agency whose main concern is education.

Finally, transfer of these schools will not make the provision of logistical support more difficult. Interservice support agreements already exist within the Department of Defense between the three Departments of the Navy, Air Force and Army, and they are working well. After the transfer, the same kinds of relationships would continue. Agreements would be worked out between a Cabinet Secretary of Education and three subcabinet secretaries in DOD, thereby improving and elevating the working relationship. Further, the DOD Schools are gradually building up their own support staff and in the near future will become self-sufficient.

We believe that the students in the DOD Overseas Dependents Schools could best be served by the new Department of Education. We hope you will join us in opposing the Schmitt Amendment and in supporting the transfer of this important school system to the new Department of Education.

Sincerely,

Sam Nunn,
Henry Jackson,
Senator McIntyre.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The legislation before us today provides for a 3-year phase-in period, so that the schools can be transferred with little disruption. The bill requires the Secretary, in the 3-year phase-in period, to make recommendations for increasing parent, teacher, student, and military participation in the schools' operation and administration.

S. 991 also provides for an administrator and an Office of Education for overseas dependent children at executive level V, reporting directly to the Secretary of Education. This will insure a minimum of red tape and a maximum of high-level attention to the schools.

Mr. President, I would hope the Senate would concur with the unanimous recommendation of the Governmental Affairs Committee that the DOD dependent schools be transferred to the Department of Education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, with regret, I also must oppose the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT) to delete the transfer of the Department of Defense's overseas schools for dependent children. Neither I nor the rest of the committee were persuaded that these schools should continue to be run by the military. These are regular American elementary and secondary schools. The students are the same as students attending schools in any school district in this country. The only difference is that, since they are the children of parents who are serving in the military overseas, their classrooms are located overseas. Other than that, the curriculums, teachers, and other aspects of education are

The Members of this Congress, and the people of the United States, do not expect the Department of Defense to make as one of its chief goals the efficient and productive operation of the nation's twelfth largest school district. Nevertheless, it is exactly for that reason that our system does not maintain the quality level of education that it should. And it is exactly for that reason that our system should be moved into a Department whose primary goal is education.

Problems such as the ones cited by Mr. Moore illustrate the need to transfer these schools. Another problem which I would like to mention is the transition of the Overseas Dependents Schools' students to schools back here in the States. The terms of duty for many military personnel is 3 years. As a result, there is considerable movement between the overseas dependent schools and schools here. One of the problems which the committee was told about was the difficulties which students make when they go through this transition between schools. It is important that these students be given a sense of continuity. By placing jurisdiction for these schools with the new Department of Education, the resources available to schools here in the States would be much more readily available to the schools overseas.

Educators, not military personnel, are better equipped to run a school. Educators should be running the overseas dependents schools. Unfortunately, too often untrained military personnel have too much authority over how these schools should be run. For those reasons, of DODDS into the Department of Education.

During the hearings on this legislation, a question was raised regarding logistical support from DOD for a Department of Education organization. Our General Counsel pointed out that for two years DODDS has been separate from direct control by the military departments. Logistical support has been provided through interservice support agreements. The Director of DODDS concurred that support has been equal if not superior to past direct support arrangements. Therefore, any potential logistical support problems are already being resolved and should not be considered a negative factor in considering this transfer.

It is our sincere hope that you will support the transfer of DODDS into the Department of Education, and vote against the Schmitt amendment to S. 991.

Sincerely,

HAL MOSHER,
President.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I realize and have attempted to understand the position and belief of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut and the distinguished Senator from Illinois, but I literally fail to see, admitting the troubled history of these schools, how putting them in another bureaucracy will change that, particularly a bureaucracy that is going to have the problems of transition, the problems of creating itself and of dealing with everything else it is almost certainly going to have to deal with in education, including competing demands, and also somehow take over the management of the 11th largthe same.

I would in particular like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the testimony given to the committee by the Overseas Education Association. This organization represents the 7,000 teachers who teach in the overseas dependents schools. In his testimony, Carl D. Moore, executive director of the organization, states:

> Our teachers have long felt that important educational policies have been inhibited, ignored, and misconstrued by a bureaucracy whose expertise and objectives are not educationally oriented. Important education concepts, already widely accepted in public school systems in the States, are often difficult to realize even when the Association, teachers and the DODDs administration support them. We cannot help but believe that our system will improve and prosper if it is nurtured in an environment dedicated to education.

Mr. President, I am happy to yield to our distinguished colleague from Oklahoma for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Hazel Elbert of my staff be accorded the privileges of the floor during all stages of the consideration of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This date?

Mr. BARTLETT. This date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Mr. Moore's comments should not be regarded as an effort to find fault with the Department of Defense. I continue quoting from his testimony before the committee:

Mr. President, I urge my coleagues to vote against this amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter that I have received from Hal Mosher, president of the Overseas Education Association, Inc., dated September 25, 1978, in support of the position that the managers of the bill have taken.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OVERSEAS EDUCATION ASSOCIATION, INC.,
September 25, 1978.

Hon. CHARLES PERCY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PERCY: It has come to our attention that Senator Schmitt is planning to introduce an amendment to S. 991 to eliminate the Department of Defense Dependents Schools (DODDS) from the bill.

Our Association holds exclusive national recognition for the 7,000 teachers in the DODDS system. We believe the members of the armed services stationed overseas deserve the best possible educational program for their children, and this can be achieved only if education is recognized as the highest priority. The teachers in our system strongly believe that education does not receive the priority consideration within the Department of Defense that it would in the Department of Education. Our view is obviously shared by the military parents inasmuch as the European Parent-Teacher-Student Association enthusiastically supports the transfer of DODDS into the Department of Education. Our informal polls also indicate that most of the school administrators support this transfer. The parents and professional educators involved in the system are almost unanimous in their support of the transfer est school system in this country or associated with this country, and to do this in association with another bureaucracy—and anyone who has been associated with the military certainly cannot claim it is not a bureacracy. Even the Office of Management and Budget says it is best to work out the problems of the overseas schools within the Department of Defense rather than by transferring them to another department.

I am sorry that the distinguished Senators have not dealt more specifically with how they expect this belief to be realized. I am willing to say that in 2 or 3 or 4 years, after the Department is up to speed, if it is in fact created, and I guess there is some doubt about that, but let us assume it will be created, we might then examine this problem and see whether or not the Department of Defense has solved its problems with the overseas school system, or whether, in the view of a functioning Department of Education, they could be better solved in that group.

I just fail to see how anything worthwhile is going to be realized in that school system, that very special school system, by its transfer into the Department of Education.

I would also remind my colleagues that another group, admittedly smaller, but another group representing about 2,000 teachers within the overseas school system, that is, the Overseas Federation of Teachers, associated with the American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, have come to a different conclusion. That is not a large group, but it is a significant minority, and if the situation is anything like I find in this country, the rank and file of the teacher organizations that support the creation of a Department of Education are not necessarily as strongly in favor or even in favor of its creation. I find that there is really only one organizational group that is strongly in favor of this particular measure, and that is the NEA.

I remind my colleagues that there is a great tendency in the NEA to become, or to attempt to become, an elitist, special-interest group for "education," and it is a special interest that I personally believe goes counter to the long-term educational interests of this country, which comes from the diversity of our educational system and its ability, in turn, to tap the diversity of the American people through local control.

I am tremendously troubled by this creation, now, of a Federal school system specifically within a department of education. Obviously the overseas school system is a Federal school system, but it is not under the control, the Cabinet-level control, of a vested interest in education. It is under the control of the vested interest of the Department of Defense, and in fact its schools are run with that vested interest in mind. I have tried to describe what that interest is; it is a legitimate interest, in this Senator's opinion, and one which best serves the students of that school system.

Mr. President, if the distinguished chairman of the committee is willing to yield back the remainder of his time, I would be happy to yield back mine.

to another. After carefully considering all sides of this issue, I have determined that the DOD overseas dependent schools could function more effectively and provide a better qualify education to the children of our military personnel if their administration were moved to the Department of Education. I support this transfer for the following reasons:

First. There are approximately 135,000 students in 267 DOD dependents schools scattered across 24 different foreign countries. The fiscal year 1979 budget estimate for the schools is $307 million. Altogether, there are approximately 10,000 employees in the school system. Despite the fact there is so much money involved and so many children whose education is dependent on these schools, there is no statutory authority for the schools. In more than 30 years of their "temporary" existence, the DOD schools' authorization has been contained in appropriations bill. S. 991 provides, for the first time, a statutory base for these schools.

Second. Although I firmly believe that the future of our military personnel's children is vitally important, I recognize that the Department of Defense and the congressional Armed Services Committee do not give these schools the attention they deserve. This is not a criticism of DOD or the committees. It is perfectly understandable that the administration of these schools is not the primary function or the No. 1 priority of the Department of Defense or the Armed Services Committees of the House and demic facilities and other Federal programs which could benefit the schools. The children of our Nation's military personnel should not be deprived of participation in these programs just because their families are stationed overseas.

Fifth. There would be no disruption in the operation of these schools during the transition. This legislation provides for a 3 year "phase-in" period, during which time the Secretary is required to develop a comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer. Also, section 505(A) of the bill insures that the agreements between the schools' present administration and the Armed Forces in existence at the time the Department of Education is established shall remain in effect until new agreements are negotiated as part of the planned transfer. Also, the committee report recommends that the Secretary of Education investigate the practicality and feasibility of the creation of a board or commission, made up of parents, students, educators, school administrators and the military, which could assume some measure of input over operation and policy responsibilities for the school system. Such a board would facilitate logistical support by including military personnel as members to insure cooperation by the various armed services and the local base commander. The board could also serve as an effective insulator to minimize the direct involvement in the future of the schools by the Secretary of Education.

Overall, I believe that the language which was included in the bill will provide a sound, workable administration

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Senator from Georgia wishes to make some remarks; then I will be prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I will move, at the proper time, to table the amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President——

Mr. RIBICOFF. I will not move to table now but I ask unanimous consent that I may now ask for the yeas and nays on a motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to ordering the yeas and nays on such a motion at this time? Without objection, it is so ordered.

[illegible] there a sufficient second? There is [illegible]cient second.

[illegible] yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment by Senator SCHMITT that would delete from S. 991 the transfer of the Department of Defense overseas dependents schools. I do this from a unique position of being a primary sponsor of S. 991, a member of the Governmental Affairs Committee who chaired hearings on this particular aspect of the bill, and a member of the Armed Services Committee.

It is always a difficult decision to move certain programs from one department the Senate. Under this legislation, the overseas defense schools will be administered by a level 5 official in the new Department of Education who will report directly to the Secretary. This high level official will provide these schools with more attention and oversight than they have received in their 30-year history. I believe that such attention will improve the quality of the schools and will make a positive difference in the minimum educational standards, acquisition of pertinent educational supplies and the availability of knowledge into new trends and methods of teaching.

Third. The inclusion in a new Department of Education will also facilitate the transition for these students, who are temporarily overseas and away from our Nation, into our public school systems. Since military families are subject to frequent moves, we should strive to provide a sense of continuity in education for these students. The Department of Education would be more attuned to the trends in American public education than the Department of Defense and could provide valuable assistance to the school administrators in sensing, adjusting and responding to these educational trends.

Fourth. The Department of Education could also bring to these overseas schools the vast educational resources which will be available to schools throughout this Nation. The Department of Education can make strong efforts to encourage the participation of these overseas schools in vocational educational programs, services for the education of the handicapped, gifted children, library and aca-for the DOD overseas schools. Because of their unique role in educating the children of American military personnel stationed overseas, these schools will, of necessity, be administered by a Federal agency that is far removed from the actual operation of the schools. The quality of education offered these students will receive a higher priority in the proposed Department of Education than it presently does in the Department of Defense.

This proposed transfer is not only endorsed by the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs. It has the strong support of the administration, the Department of Defense, the Overseas Education Association, the majority of the overseas school administrators and the European PTSA. The need for this change is perhaps further emphasized by the fact that this is probably the only transfer in this bill that is fully supported by all affected parties.

I believe that the aforementioned consensus that these student could best be served by the Department of Education is a fair assessment of the needs in the overseas dependent schools, and I urge the Senate to reject the Schmitt amendment and support the transfer.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, the Senator may want to withhold that.

Mr. President, I am still very greatly troubled by the litany of beliefs that we have heard in support of not only the bill as a whole but particularly in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico relative to the transfer of the overseas dependent school system to the Department of Education. Where I have tried to list those factual situations where difficulties more than likely will occur, we have not seen in this debate, at any rate, the rebuttal of why those difficulties will not occur, except the belief that they will not occur. Again, I think that at least a postponement of the inclusion of the overseas dependent school system in the new Department of Education, if it is in fact created, would be the much wiser path to take.

In a measure, I believe, before the other body of the Congress, it is proposed to give statutory authority to the overseas dependent school system. I see no reason why that should be any kind of an argument against my amendment whatsoever. That can be done. Congress can do that at any time. Much more serious, I believe, is the basic constitutional intent. I will not say that a transfer necessarily is unconstitutional. I am not a constitutional lawyer. I would be on very tenuous ground to say that. But I would say that the lack of mention of education in the Consitution, along with the reservation of powers to the States, strongly suggests to this Senator that there was never any intent by the Founding Fathers nor any intent subsequently, through recent decades, to have the Federal Government involved in any significant way in the policymaking, in the administration, or other activities of the educational system of this country.

There is one unassailable fact, that if the overseas dependent school system is

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment. I believe I have already asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was waiting for the motion to be laid before it.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), and the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. McINTYRE) are necessarily absent.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 65, nays 23, as follows:

The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Carol Minton of Senator BUMPERS' staff be granted privilege of the floor during consideration and votes on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHMITT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I believe that under the agreement, I am to be recognized for the next amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct, and the Senator from New Mexico has been recognized.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHMITT. I yield to the Senator from Washington, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I am going to vote for this bill for several reasons, but one of the main reasons is that I happened to handle the very complex Labor-HEW appropriation bill, a big, complex department——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend? The Senate is not in order, and we will not proceed until the Senate is in order.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I said that I was for transferred to the Department of Education when it is formed, the Federal Government will be in the business of operating a school system, and a large school system.

It has been said that the administration favors this transfer. The favors of the administration are very often transient. Not long ago, the OMB, as I have already read into the Record, opposed it. The Department of Defense has opposed it in the past. They now give not strong support as suggested by the Senator from Georgia, but I would say very lukewarm support for this proposal, and I think it may well be provided under duress.

I do not think the majority of the American people have any desire whatsoever to have the Federal Government operating a school system as large, or any size but certainly not one as large, as that which is going to be transferred under S. 991. As a matter of fact, just this morning I inserted into the Record a poll taken recently that indicated 45 percent of the American people opposed the Department of Education in general, and only 40 percent supported it.

Anybody who believes that we are dealing with some strong national consensus, or even a consensus, among the military personnel of this country that the Department of Defense overseas dependents schools should be included in a Department of Education is just fundamentally wrong.

If the Senator from Connecticut has no further need of his time, I yield back the remainder of my time. I urge the rejection of his tabling motion and I urge the adoption of my amendment.

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 3620 was agreed to.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Senate will suspend this bill for many reasons. But one of the main reasons—I think the distinguished manager of the bill understands what I am talking about—is that Labor-HEW is a great, big, complex organization. It is almost bigger than the Defense Department.

They now have 1,144,000 people employed, for whom the Federal Government pays. Within that Department, they have the problems of education.

For housekeeping purposes alone, if that were the only consideration I had, I would vote for this bill. No one knows better what I am talking about than the distinguished manager of the bill, the Senator from Connecticut, who was Secretary of HEW.

The removal of education from this big, complex department is going to do a great job, I think, not only for housekeeping, but also, it is going to save money; it is going to put education where it should be—by itself, independent. It probably never should have been there to begin with.

I just wanted to make that statement as one of the reasons why I am for this bill. There are other reasons, also.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on my time?

Mr. SCHMITT. I am happy to yield, on the time of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, when I came to the Senate in 1963, the first conversation I had in this body was with the distinguished Senator from Washington. He said to me:

> Abe, you're out of HEW and you're now in the United States Senate. Please help me get education out of HEW.

I said:

> Warren, I can tell you that from the first week I was in HEW, I felt that education did not belong there.

HEW was and has become a bureaucratic monster. It is impossible for them to handle all the constituencies affected by it.

We are the only country in the world that puts together in one department health, education, and welfare.

Mr. MAGNUSON. And labor.

Mr. RIBICOFF. What is very interesting is that in a period of 12 years, we have had 13 different Commissioners of Education. A Commissioner of Education goes in HEW with stars in his eyes, feeling he is going to do something for education; and he is so closed in and inundated by the bureaucracy that nothing happens with education.

We are spending billions of dollars for education, and we really are not giving the taxpayers of this country or our children what they should be getting from the taxpayers' money.

In 1963, I introduced a bill for a Department of Education. I felt then and all these years that the time has come, and the time is now, to give the children of this country, a Department of Education to help them, not hinder them, because education has been deteriorating in this country.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Alaska for the purpose of his moving in sequence ahead of The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alaska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Chair inform me when I have 5 minutes remaining, so that I may yield that time to the Senator from Arizona?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will do so.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am pleased to say that Senator JACKSON, who has been the chairman for many years of the committee having jurisdiction over Indian affairs, as well as Senator GOLDWATER, Senator YOUNG, Senator CHILES, Senator ANDERSON, Senator BARTLETT, Senator CHURCH, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator HANSEN, Senator BURDICK, Senator GRAVEL, Senator MATHIAS, Senator McCLURE, Senator HAYAKAWA, Senator STONE, and Senator MORGAN support this amendment and are cosponsors of it.

With a few exceptions, we represent Indian country, and we have been asked to speak for the Indian people who, if they were here, would plead with Senators not to transfer the functions of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the new Department of Education without their consent.

Last week, the National Congress of American Indians, representing 143 tribes, met at Rapid City, S. Dak. They unanimously—I repeat, unanimously—passed a resolution in support of this amendment.

In addition, the National Indian Education Association, the American Indian Higher Education Consortium, the Coalition of Indian Controlled School Boards, the American Indian Scholarships, the Association of American Indian Physicians, and the Governors' Interstate Indian Council all are on record, as well as the National Tribal Chairmen's Association, which represents 190 tribal chairmen, in asking us to present this amendment and to secure its adoption in the Senate.

I could repeat all the arguments that have been made; but, for myself, the argument that makes the most sense is the one they presented themselves when I chaired the hearings of our committee on the subject.

They told me:

> Self-determination and the Educational Assistance Act have not been in place long enough for us to make the progress that should be made on our own in managing and controlling our own destiny.

They asked me for additional time before their programs are combined with those of the Department of Education. It is not a position that says that they would never consent to merging the functions of Indian education with the Department of Education.

They say that if self-determination means anything, the Indian control over Indian issues, on which we promised we would listen to them, then the whole spirit of self-determination, will be violated if Congress does not listen to them as they represent their people in telling us they do not support this move.

The chairman, I am sure, will say there has been consultation. Yes, we sent

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my friend from Alaska.

Mr. President, what we are dealing with here are not children of families that speak English. In fact, what very few of us realize is that there are 400 Indian tribes living in the continental United States and there are 300 more living in the State of Alaska. The great majority of these tribes still speak their native tongue.

In my State where 20 percent of all the Indians of America live, we have 15 different tribes who speak three different basic languages.

This is a problem that we are not faced with in the non-Indian or white man schools where they speak a common language, but that is only the beginning, Mr. President.

They not only speak a language that is completely and absolutely foreign to us or any of our academics, I know of only two Indian languages that are being taught in this country, and it is virtually impossible to learn one of them.

On top of that, Mr. President, we have their culture, and I have to say this sadly. For many, many years it was one of the purposes of the BIA to try and convince the Indians that their culture had to go. We have been successful, I have to say, in the last 10 or 15 years in convincing the Bureau of Indian Affairs that Indian culture is probably the only basic culture we have in this country.

I do not care whether you live in Maine or California or Texas or North Dakota, done. But I do not have the kind of respect for the National Education Association that many people do. I do not think that education in the primary schools of our country has improved one bit under the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. I think it has gotten worse. I do not think there is a country in the world that has a worse system of education to educate their young people in the elementary levels than we have today.

I do not want to see my Indians turned over to a group like that. I know it sounds good to turn all of these children, regardless of their background, over to one educational system. I would much rather as one individual have something to say about the education of my grandchildren at the elementary level. I do not want somebody sitting back here 2,500 miles away in the city of Washington describing the kind of a teacher or the kind of books or the curricula that my grandchildren are going to have to put up with in Arizona and California.

I would like to see us doing it the old-fashioned way, and I will guarantee you when I went to grammar school I was not the brightest thing that ever came around the post, but, by golly, I learned how to write and read and get 2 and 2 to come out 4.

Today what do we find in our colleges? Almost every college in America has a noncredit freshman class to teach students who graduated from high school how to read, write, and add. And yet we want to make a Department of Educathem questionnaires. He will say, and others will say, there are important Indian people who support the bill and oppose my amendment. That is true. But the overwhelming majority of those who are elected to represent Indian people in their councils and in national organizations support this amendment and pleaded with me as a representative of our committee when just by chance I was selected to chair the hearings that day. I committed to them that I would present this amendment and I would urge the Senate to listen to them as elected representatives of the Indian people in their plea to Congress not to do this, not to transfer the Indian functions of education to the new Department of Education without their consent.

I would be pleased to answer any questions any Member of the Senate might have on this issue, but, as I said, for myself it is a matter of representation. The people, the Indians and the Alaska Natives have elected to represent them in their councils and to come and present their views to Congress did come and they almost without exception—stated to the committee on the record, and have communicated with us since this amendment was filed, the overwhelming mandate they have from the Indians and Native people of the country to oppose this transfer at this time.

I hope the Senate will listen to these people who have been elected to represent those of our citizens who are of Indian or Native descent.

Let me yield to my good friend from Arizona. I am proud to have his support on this amendment.

the Indians were here first, and the culture that they developed is still the basic culture that affects our lives, affects the names of our States, the names of our citiees, and the names of our streets. It is the culture that has developed the beautiful artifacts that we now find almost impossible to buy on the market, the culture that is making it possible for Indians to make a decent living now and it is becoming more and more so.

Then we have the matter of religion. This is something we do not have to put up with with our children. As to our white children, when they go to school, be they Gentile or Jewish, regardless of the religion they are following, the education has no bearing on it. They do not try to influence them.

However, for years it was the effort of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to convince the Indian family that our God was better than theirs. Now, thank that same God, we have been able to convince the BIA that this is bad

I am not convinced that an educational organization such as is being sought here would not go right back to the ideas of the BIA because we do not have enough experienced people in the National Education Association. I do not know one of them who would not have a hard time telling an Indian from a white man.

So I am for this Stevens amendment, representing as I do 20 percent of the Indians in this country. It is not that I am standing up here and saying that the Bureau of Indian Affairs has done a fantastically good job in education. They have done a bad job. In fact, it would be hard to conceive of a worse job being tion. Frankly, I would like to do away with any Federal education.

If we are going to give the money, write out a check and send it to the Governor and say, "This is for education." But do not send along a lot of bureaucrats who do not know anything about it to tell the people in our States how to spend it.

And that is particularly true in an area where we are just beginning to know something about what these Indians want in the way of education. They want to learn English. But they do not want to be told that English is the language that they have to use.

They want to learn Apache, they want to learn Hopi, they want to learn Navajo, and at the same time learn English.

They want to be taught about their culture. We have classes out in my State now that will teach a Navajo girl how to weave a blanket, one of the most beautiful basic cultural arts in this country, and yet the BIA was trying to tell them they should not waste their time weaving blankets; they ought to be doing something else. What, I do not know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

lieve there is another Member of this body who has been devoted and so involved with the problems of Indians. I quote:

> There is not an Indian in this country who can honestly say that the BIA has been sufficiently responsive to the educational needs of Indian people.
> For the past 130 years, the BIA has failed miserably in providing Indian people with a quality education. I have no reason to expect that it will ever make any real effort to improve Indian education.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of Senator Abourezk, dated September 26, 1978, be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C., September 26, 1978.

Dear Colleague: Within the next few days the Senate is expected to vote on final passage of S. 991, the Department of Education Bill. S. 991, as reported by the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, provides for the transfer of both HEW's Office of Indian Education and the education functions of the Department of Interior's Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) into the proposed Department of Education.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, Indian education in this country is a mess. The achievement rates of Indian students are below the national average. Dropout rates for Indian children at the elementary and secondary level exceed 50 percent. Dropout rates for Indian students in posteducation institutions exceed 75 percent.

I would like to read from a letter sent to all our colleagues by Senator ABOUREZK who is chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs. I do not be-

Currently pending is an amendment by Senator Stevens which would delete the transfer of Indian programs out of the BIA in the Department of the Interior into the newly created Department of Education.

My position on this amendment represents one of the most difficult decisions I have made since I have been in politics. As Chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs, my policy has always been to attempt to accomplish legislatively what the tribes have indicated they want done to further their progress toward self-sufficiency. This marks the first time that I have significantly departed from that policy.

As you are aware, a great many of the Indian tribes—not all of them, but a great many—are opposed to the transfer of Indian education functions out of the BIA. The relationship of the Indian tribes and the BIA is a kind of love-hate relationship. In fact, the tribes severely and vehemently dislike the BIA and the patronizing attitude and manner with which the BIA treats tribes and Indian people. Yet, they are protective of the BIA because they feel that it is all they really have. There is not an Indian in this country who can honestly say that the BIA has been sufficiently responsive to the educational needs of Indian people.

Without doubt, the quality of educational programs being offered to Indian children today is simply and unjustifiably bad. There is no comprehensive Federal strategy for Indian Education. Under existing policy, there is a Deputy Commissioner for Indian Education in the Office of Education in HEW and a Director of Education in the BIA—with little or no coordination between the two. Since 1966 the average tenure of the Director of Education in the BIA has been nine months.

For the past 130 years, the BIA has failed miserably in providing Indian people with a quality education. I have no reason to expect that it will ever make any real effort to improve Indian education. No amount of in-house reorganization in the BIA will ever correct the severe institutional deficiencies which thwart the delivery of effective educational services. Clearly, the BIA's record over the past 130 years does not warrant maintaining educational programs in that agency.

The proposed transfer does not represent a long-term attempt to dismantle the BIA. Nor will such a transfer change the special relationship between the Government and the Indian tribes and Indian people in any way.

The goal of S. 991 is to improve the delivery of educational services to Indian people, while maintaining these special relationships. It is my sincere hope that by placing the various Federal educational programs in one Department, the Congress will for the first time mandate a comprehensive and responsible approach to the delivery of Indian education services.

As someone who has been active in Indian issues for a great many years, I take particular interest in this piece of legislation. I believe that S. 991 protects the interests of Indian people and represents a sincere effort by the Federal government to improve the quality of Indian education in this country. It is for these reasons that I urge you to support S. 991, as reported by the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, with the improving Dominici amendments, and to oppose any efforts to delete the transfer of Indian education programs from S. 991, the Department of Education Bill.

If you have any further questions or need any additional information on this matter, please feel free to contact Mimi Mager of my staff (45852).

Sincerely,

James Abourezk,
Chairman, Senate Select Committee

great responsibility in the Senate, if we do move Indian education into the Department of Education to oversee, to make absolutely certain that very high priority is placed on Indian education by the Department of Education, and that we do not have a continuation of the abysmal situation we now have.

For these reasons, and the reasons I have previously given, I do oppose the amendment offered by our distinguished colleague.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I might answer one small point the Senator has made?

Mr. DOMENICI. Surely.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the figures the Senator from Illinois has used are correct. But you have to look at the basic problem. The largest Indian tribe in this country is the Navajos. Almost 22 percent of all the Indians we have are Navajos. They are a semi-nomadic people. They do not live in towns. They live in little groups, family groups, maybe 10 or 12 people.

It may be 150 miles to the nearest school. This is the problem you have in Chicago, we have in Phoenix, you have in Los Angeles. When an Indian leaves the reservation and you say he is not educated, it is virtually impossible under any system to get these children to go to school, No. 1. The families need them to herd the sheep; they need them to pick the piñon nuts, so they grow up to be

My Indian people are saying, "So long as you protect certain rights that are ours, the trust relationship, the fact that there will be Indian preference, the fact that Indians ought to be involved in advising, the fact that there will be a department or a special arm of this new department that will help with Indian education," they say, "we cannot lose."

The reason they say it is because things are not working now. I know the good Senator, Senator Ribicoff, had the same problem on Indian health. At some point in American history we decided that the way to help our Indian people was to have a Bureau of Indian Affairs, and then as delivery systems evolved in this country we put them all under this Bureau, so we had them delivering health when they did not know anything about health.

We finally took it away from them and gave it to the professionals who deliver health. There is nobody who can argue that their health problems are such that they are not significantly better off than they were under the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

The same thing exists here, and I believe the Senate ought to exercise the responsibility here to say since it is not working, since we protected the Indian people's rights, and their rights are very peculiar and sacred, since we have a trust relationship with them nationally, it is not just whether or not we want to educate; with the Indian people we have a trust relationship that we are going to furnish them with education.

on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I have spoken on this issue before. I am particularly concerned about the high rate of unemployment among the American Indians. We have had a great many migrate to Chicago, and our principal problem is one of finding employment for them. We have some 20,000 there, and their biggest problem has been the lack of education.

Our primary responsibility now, I should think, would be to insure, after all these years, that we find a method of giving the highest possible quality education to them. Unfortunately, education is not the primary responsibility of BIA.

Just like with the Department of Defense, where an amendment to delete that transfer was tabled by an overwhelming margin just a few moments ago, the same reasoning prevails here. BIA's responsibility is not education. In S. 991 we do establish an Office of Indian Education headed by an Assistant Secretary for Indian education, thus assuring priority attention in the new department.

I would simply say, as one Senator deeply concerned about the state of the American Indians—and we have our distinguished colleagues who know a great deal about it and who have lived with it most of their lives—we have a young men and women without having been exposed to school.

When they have the chance to go to school they are superb students. There is no child in America with a higher IQ than the Hopi child.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield? I only have 5 minutes left and all this is being charged to us.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOMENICI. I was delighted to yield to my good friend from Arizona.

It is not with great pleasure that I am here opposing two of my best friends who know a lot about Indian problems, my good friend from Arizona and, as I indicated the other day, Senator STEVENS from Alaska, whose interest in Indian problems is second to none. But I come from a State also with a substantial Indian population. I have 19 pueblos. They are a different kind of Indian than the Navajo, but, nevertheless, they are native American Indians.

There is a substantial disagreement among Indian people on what we ought to do. But those particular Indian people, the 19 pueblos in my State, support the transfer. I am going to just tell the Senate why I think they do.

First of all, I believe they are completely convinced that while the Bureau of Indian Affairs may have great expertise in some areas, there can be no question that they have run a less than second-rate Indian education program. It is absolutely a disgrace. The facts have been cited.

I think there is little gamble here. As Senator ABOUREZK indicated the other day, some Indian leaders are afraid because the Bureau of Indian Affairs has them worried that this is the beginning of the dismantling of the relationship. It is dismantling nothing in terms of the trust relationship. We are just saying, "Let us try the Department of Education to professionally run education for Indian children."

It is with regret that I have to oppose the good Senator from Alaska, but I believe the Senate would be making a decision in favor of helping the young Indian people of our country have a chance at education, where we have failed miserably to this point.

I fail to see the risk. If it does not work, it is not working now. If it does not work, they have not lost a trust relationship, they have not lost any of the things that they have.

Maybe we can find some other way to deliver the service, but all the risks are on the side of right here, of trying to do what we should have been doing from the beginning in spite of the difficult circumstances.

I agree with the good Senator from Arizona that it is difficult to develop a program of education in this field. But why should we assume that the Bureau of Indian Affairs under the Department of the Interior is apt to do a better job than the Department of Education?

I do believe this is one instance when we ought to go ahead and do what is right.

The only argument I have heard is that we did not counsel with them in advance, and that does have an impact on me. But I believe in the process of developing this legislation they have been counseled with. I have read the record and they have been here from all over the country. They have appeared and testified and stated their concerns.

I say to my good friend from Alaska that every one of their major concerns, as they testified in opposition, has now been included in this bill either as it came to the floor or when we proposed and adopted the Domenici amendment, which added four additional protections and desires they were talking about in the hearings.

So I truly believe that there is no gamble here at all, because when there is a gamble usually you think there is a chance of losing. I submit there is no chance for the Indian people to lose here. What can they lose, when we have done such a poor job to this point? We protected their rights in committee, and we are giving them a fresh start and a golden opportunity for finding ways to provide education for the young Indian people of our country.

I hope that the Senate will vote against the Stevens amendment, and transfer this function to the Department of Education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have 30 seconds to put in the Record a resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President: I applaud consideration on the Senate floor of legislation to establish a Department of Education. As a cosponsor of this measure and a member of the Subcommittee on Education, I strongly urge my colleagues to support it.

Education is essential to the well-being of our democracy, for, in an ignorant country the people cannot choose. And, education is essential to the well-being of the people who reside in our democracy for it is the basis of the developments in the arts and sciences which are the hallmark of a progressive and civilized society.

That is why the people of America care so much about education. State and local governments spend more on education—close to 40 percent of their budgets—than on any other item. Schooling is universally available and universally required. The proportion of children who start school earlier and continue longer has increased year by year.

It is time, Mr. President, that we show the same concern on the Federal level. The Federal Government must not usurp the place of the States and localities in providing education. But, we must insure that we do all that we can to help the States and localities provide equal opportunity education of high quality. Education in this country needs help today, and we must give our assistance. The bill which the distinguished Senator from Connecticut has crafted and brought to the floor does this admirably.

It is difficult to focus Federal atten-

Rights in the Department is given more prominence, is insulated from programmatic pressures, and its Director will report directly to the President, Secretary, and Congress.

The new Department will allow for much better coordination of Federal programs for elementary and secondary education. In addition, an assistant secretary who is responsible for the delivery of all services to students, schools, and boards of education will have the capacity to respond to the overall needs of these people. The current fragmentation leaves educators on the local level no one to turn to when their problems go beyond the specific legislation administered by some official. An important focus of the new Assistant Secretary will be to insure the availability of Federal programs to all those who are eligible. Fewer than half the eligible students are being served through title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act; fewer than 10 percent of the eligible students are being served by bilingual education programs. The Assistant Secretary should see how we can most effectively utilize our resources in these areas.

The new Department would also be able to make substantial contributions to the effective support of post-secondary education and of occupational, adult, and community education by the Federal Government.

Altogether, a new Department of Education will indicate that we, at the Fed-objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. The National Congress of American Indians passed a resolution last week which took note of the Domenici amendment, and stated this:

> Whereas, there is pending legislation to create a separate Department of Education (S. 991/H.R. 13343) that would transfer many education programs presently housed in other agencies into this Department, and
> Whereas, the overwhelming majority of Tribes have gone on record in opposition to transferring B.I.A. Education into the new Department, and
> Whereas, the U.S. House of Representatives has respected the wishes of Tribes in its actions thus far by deleting the transfer of B.I.A. Education from their version of the bill (H.R. 133430), and
> Whereas, Senator Stevens and twelve other Senators have cosponsored an amendment in concert with the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the Tribes, which will delete the transfer of B.I.A. Education from the bill, and.
>
> Whereas, Senator Domenici and Senator Melcher have introduced a conflicting "Indian" amendment that transfers B.I.A. Education, and
> Whereas, the simultaneous introduction of two different "Indian" amendments has created confusion for Senators who do not know which Indian amendment the Tribes want them to support;
>
> Now therefore be it resolved, that the Tribes of the National Congress of American Indians oppose the Domenici/Melcher Indian Amendment;
> Be it further resolved that the Tribes of NCAI endorse and support the Senator Stevens Indian Amendment.

The resolution was adopted by representatives of 143 tribes on September 19, 1978.

tion on educational needs within the HEW context. HEW is overwhelmingly concerned with health and welfare issues and the Secretary has little time to devote to education. Education should become the focus of a Cabinet official, who has the resources and the time to devote to making the Federal effort more effective. The offices that have been established within this new Department indicate the increased attention we will be able to give to the various aspects of education: offices for elementary and secondary education; postsecondary education; occupational, adult and community education; civil rights; research and improvement; special education and rehabilitative services.

Mr. President, this legislation not only increases Federal attention to education but achieves many other objectives as well

The bill emphasizes the need for citizen involvement in the educational process. Such involvement can be the touchstone for better education. It has always been a primary concern of mine—from parental involvement in the education of native Americans, to parental involvement in education for the educationally disadvantaged. As the committee report notes:

> One of the major functions of the Department will be to assess parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required by law and to encourage the involvement of parents, students and the public in the development and implementation of the Department's programs.

The bill strengthens our ability to insure equal educational opportunities for all individuals. The Office of Civil eral level, recognize the Federal responsibility to assist local and State governments in their educational efforts. No more should education take a back seat. For, in education lies the future.

Mr. President, I have two concerns with the Department of Education bill before us. One, the transfer of Indian education to the new Department, I will address now. The other, the place of science education, I will address at the appropriate time.

In the 91st Congress I chaired the Special Subcommittee on Indian Education of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The hearings and investigations of the subcommittee filled 4,077 pages in 7 volumes. We found the condition of Indian education was no less than shocking. Compared to other Americans, far more Indians were illiterate; the average level of education was far lower; the dropout rates in secondary schools were far higher; far fewer Indians went on to college and far fewer of those who went subsequently graduated.

In response to our findings, the subcommittee made 60 recommendations for changes in the way Indian education programs are run. Among them, we recommended a series of specific objectives for educational opportunities for Indians and the establishment of a Select Committee for Indians. We suggested vastly increased participation and control by Indians of their own education programs; that the BIA Commissioner in Interior be raised to an Assistant Secretary; that a National Indian Board of Indian Education be established with the authority to set standards for Federal Indian schools; and that Indian boards of education be established for Indian school districts. We recommended special programs to meet the needs of Indian children—for culturally sensitive curricula and bilingual educational efforts. Stimulated in part by these recommendations, then Senator WALTER MONDALE and I authored title IV of the Indian Education Act of 1972. But our special subcommittee made no recommendation as to whether educational efforts should be removed from BIA, stating instead:

> Because we believe it critically important that the Indians themselves express their voices on this matter, we have suggested that it be put high on the agenda of the White House Conference on American Indian Affairs.

That conference never took place and the position of Indian education in the Federal structure was left open.

The bill reported by the committee moves all of the educational programs currently run by the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the new Department of Education. It establishes an Assistant Secretary position and a separate office to run Indian education programs.

I understand the concerns being addressed by the committee in making this change, nonetheless, I disagree with the decision and will vote against the transfer.

The Governmental Affairs Committee notes in its report on this bill that Indian education is divided between programs in BIA and the Office of Education. The quality of the programs run by BIA is still not acceptable. The Director of Edu- tems. The number of tribally operated contract schools has gone from 2 to 35; in the past 5 years the number of Johnson-O'Malley contracts has gone from 4 to 121. Boarding school enrollment has decreased by 9,000. Changes in BIA structure, incorporated in the ESEA reauthorization, which make the local educators responsive to the national Director of Education rather than the BIA Area Administrator promise a better performance in the future.

So, too, we must consider the place of education in the total tribal context. Separation of programs and their dispersal throughout the Federal bureaucracy will hinder Indian self-determination efforts. Different regulations, different forms, different definitions will make it more difficult for tribal governments to enter comprehensive government-to-government relationships with the Federal Government. So, too, the fragmentation of Federal efforts for Indians will inevitably hinder the consistent application of Federal trust responsibility. This must be a grave concern. There must be a place in the Federal Government which is primarily responsible for overseeing the Federal relationship with Native Americans.

Finally, the most important factor which leads me to conclude that education should stay in BIA is the overwhelming desire of those affected by the program that it stay there. There is an elementary principle of self-determination. While it is true that the Federal Government can organize itself as it wishes, the I have talked with six different Presidents to do away with the BIA.

But my argument is that American elementary education being in the mess it is in, I do not want to mess up Indian education further by turning it over to a bunch of people who are making our American educational system the worst in the world.

Mr. DOMENICI. Now I want 30 seconds, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. If we had a resolution in to get rid of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, we would have unanimous Indian resolutions here, just as we do in this case, saying "Don't get rid of them."

Mr. GOLDWATER. No, you would not.

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes, you would, because the fear of God has been put into them that if the Bureau goes, they lose all their rights. So it would have no more support from the Indian people than the transfer proposal before us has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment (No. 3588) of the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS). The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from In-cation is submerged within the BIA and Interior bureaucracies, meaning that educational concerns are not given the attention that they deserve. The position of education in this hierarchy is reflected in the fact that Directors of Education have lasted an average of 9 months each in the last 12 years.

But, when these facts are considered in context, the argument for transfer is seriously weakened. Educational quality has increased in BIA in the last 10 years. Changes in the structure of the BIA and its educational efforts have recently been enacted by both the House and Senate in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act and these changes promise an even more responsive BIA program.

Bifurcation of Indian programs between Education and BIA will make it more difficult for tribes to develop comprehensive tribal planning. Most importantly, the vast majority of the tribes deeply desire for the programs to stay in BIA. This last consideration—the voice of the Indian people—was the consideration which moved us 9 years ago; it is the consideration which must be most powerful now.

While we must do all we can to further improve the educational opportunities for Indian children, we should not denigrate those strides which have been made in the last 10 years, under BIA. The number of students in the higher education grant program has gone from 2,660 to 20,000; the daily attendance in BIA schools is now up to an average of 82 percent. This is still too low, but is better than attendance in many big city systems. The fact is that, in this instance, we are organizing to be of service to Indians; their views on how we can best be of service should receive foremost consideration. The groups which reflect the concerns of Native Americans have stated their desire that education stay in BIA: the National Tribal Chairmen's Association wants it there, the National Congress of American Indians wants it there.

Mr. President, for these reasons I believe that this body should decide to leave education of Indians in BIA, and should not transfer it to the Department of Education. There is no question that the Governmental Affairs Committee has addressed itself to real concerns in making the transfer. There is no question that the committee has tried to meet many of the concerns which have been voiced about the transfer. But many of the concerns cannot be safeguarded in the new Department, but inhere in the transfer itself. Their concerns are fundamental. Native American education should stay in the Bureau of Indian Affairs.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have 30 seconds to respond to the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not want the Senator from New Mexico to think I am defending the BIA. If you want to introduce an amendment to do away with the BIA, I will support it, or vice versa. diana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. HODGES), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), and the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK) would vote "nay."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) and the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE) would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 39, as follows:

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, the importance of science and technology in providing for both the high standard of living which we find in the United States and the defense needs of our Nation cannot be overestimated. The answer to many of the problems which we as a Nation face lies with advances in science and technology. The transfer of science education programs from the National Science Foundation will not meet the goal of improving science education in this Senator's opinion. As Charles Saun- I hope my colleagues will find that they can support this particular amendment.

Mr. President, as I have indicated, the science community is strongly opposed to the proposed transfer. This includes the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Up until very recently, it included the National Science Foundation and it does include the National Science Board.

Mr. President, I should like to quote extensively from the statement by the National Science Board relative to this matter as adopted unanimously at their April 21 and 22, 1977, meeting:

> The possible establishment of a Department of Education in the Federal Government involves a wide variety of considerations, most of them not primarily involving science. The National Science Board therefore takes no position on the issue of establishing such a Department.
> THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION AND THE SUPPORT OF SCIENCE
> It has been recommended by some that the National Science Foundation (NSF) be made part of a new Department of Education. The National Science Board strongly opposes any such suggestion. The fundamental objective of the Foundation is and should remain the health of basic science in the Nation, including both its research and education components.

This Senator emphasizes the expression "both its research and education components."

> Science focuses on the creation of new knowledge, and its effective teaching depends on that knowledge. The process of research is an activity distinct from educa-

the Department)

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, the next amendment I shall offer, I shall try to go through as briefly as possible. I think some setting of the record is important. It has to do with the transfer of the education programs from the National Science Foundation to the proposed Department of Education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has to interrupt to ask the Senator to call up his amendment so it may be reported.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I shall do that if the clerk can pick that amendment out. I have lost track of the number right now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks, Is it the one that deals with the transfer of the National Science Foundation?

Mr. SCHMITT. It deals with the National Science Foundation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT proposes an amendment numbered 3621.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

> On page 58, beginning with the word "Improvement" on line 21, strike out through the dash on line 23, and insert the following: "Improvement all functions transferred ders of the American Council on Education stated in testimony before the House Subcommittee on Legislation and National Security:

> The location of the Education Directorate within the National Science Foundation affirms the importance of the interdependence of science education and scientific research. To separate the two would inevitably damage the quality of both . . .

Mr. President, I have to agree wholeheartedly with that statement, having had most of my active professional career and associated both with science education and scientific research.

The science community is strongly opposed to this proposed transfer. The American Association for the Advancement of Science, the National Science Board, and Representative RAY THORNTON, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Science, Research and Technology testified against this transfer, as have many others.

Higher education associations are also opposed to this provision of S. 991. Ten organizations including the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, the American Council on Education, and the National Association of State Universities and Land-grant Colleges were represented in House testimony against the proposed transfer.

The House subcommittee by a vote of 5 to 2 deleted from the House version of S. 991 the provision which transfer science education programs from the National Science Foundation to the Department of Education. The full Committee rejected an attempt to reinstate this transfer into the bill by a vote of 3 to 21.

> tion, and its impact extends far beyond education. Hence, an independent agency is science effectively.
> The present organization has served the Nation well, in part because of the special nature of the policy oversight and quality control responsibility of the National Science Board. Through the National Science Board and the peer review process, a close and effective relationship between the scientific community and NSF has developed. The Board and the Foundation have been remarkably successful in effectively using limited resources to support and develop a high quality basic science program in the United States.
> The National Science Board concludes that this would not be in the best interests of science or the Nation, because activities in scientific research and science education are inextricably linked.
> In particular, the National Science Board believes that it is important that the initiatives for science education remain close to the science community, for at least three reasons:
>
> Science education must reflect current scientific knowledge and techniques.
>
> The science content of science education must be accurate as well as current.
>
> A major purpose of the science education enterprise is to ensure an adequate and continuous flow of talented people into scientific work.
> The present arrangement provides for an effective linkage between science education and research. It has achieved major successes in the past two decades, despite quite limited resources. The National Science Board strongly recommends that this arrangement be maintained..

Mr. President, the Vice Chairman of the National Science Board, my good friend, Dr. Grover E. Murray, formerly of Texas Tech University, testified before the Subcommittee on Legislation and National Security in the House of Representatives. I should like to present now excerpts from that testimony:

> The National Science Foundation deals with educational institutions of all levels and at all locations. Science education, therefore, contributes substantially to the geographic distribution of NSF funding.
> For these and other reasons, therefore, the National Science Board considers science education an integral part of the Foundation's scientific activities, as has the Congress since 1950.
> In its wisdom in 1950, the 81st Congress, which included at that time my Congressman, Mr. Mahon, passed Public Law 507, the NSF Act of 1950. In that Act the Congress welded together scientific research, technology, and science education, and directed the National Science Board and the director to do certain things, which are spelled out in the statutory act, sections 3(a)(1) to (5), 3(d) and 3(e), and others, and I would appreciate it if they are entered into the record

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have those sections printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT FROM SECTION 1 (PUBLIC LAW 507—81ST CONGRESS) (64 STAT. 149) (S. 247) AS AMENDED.

FUNCTIONS OF THE FOUNDATION

(42 U.S.C. § 1862)

> SEC. 3. (a) The Foundation is authorized and directed—
> (1) to initiate and support basic scientific research and programs to strengthen scientific research potential and science education programs at all levels in the various fields of science, including, but not limited to, programs in the > the United States, and to avoid undue concentration of such research and education.

> This union has worked well. For nearly 30 years the National Science Foundation has contributed significantly to the improvement of education in science, engineering, technology, and related fields.

Quoting aga[illegible]

> Additionally, Mr. [illegible]irman, and gentlemen, the National Science Board believes that pluralism in science education is as important as pluralism in science support. Neither will profit from a single centralized support base. We believe that monopoly is as bad and as detrimental as duplication; that neither is strictly desirable, and that an intermediate position is needed, for example, some pluralism, plus coordination.
>
> The Board believes additionally that science should be represented in any Department of Education which is created. But we do not believe that it should be concentrated or isolated there. We feel that science and technology are too important to the Nation to be organized or to be structured in such a manner that they could conceivably be dominated detrimentally by other things or activities.

Quoting again:

> Finally, I am deeply impressed that a very large, vast majority of the national higher educational organizations of this country which have testified before you to date, representing all levels and qualities of performance and including the 50-odd Land Grant Colleges and State Universities, have advocated that continuation of the present system would be in the interest of the health of our scientific and technological educational efforts. And I speak only about the National Science Foundation and science education programs of NSF to the general education programs of HEW. Such a department would not provide effective management for science education activities. I urge you to reject the Reorganization Committee's recommendations regarding the transfer of NSF programs for the following reasons:
> NSF's Science Education programs are highly specialized activities and qualitatively different from the education programs of HEW. If NSF's Science Education programs are kept intact in the new department, they will form an anomalous unit that will be too small to be effective (less than 1/200 of the department's budget); if instead they are dispersed throughout the new department, they will lose their identity and effectiveness.
>
> Science Education at NSF, though relatively small (about $78 million or 1/12 of the NSF budget), continues to have an enormous impact on the quality of American education. This is because of the thorough integration of NSF's education programs with its research activities and because science education at NSF attracts and encourages the Nation's best scientists to become active in education. Uncoupling science education and scientific research would have a negative effect at all levels—elementary schools, high schools, and colleges.
> For these reasons, the National Science Board joins me in strongly opposing the transfer of the NSF Science Education programs to the proposed Department of Education.
> Sincerely yours,
> RICHARD C. ATKINSON, Director.

Mr. President, since that time, of course, it is only fair to say Mr. Atkinson has changed his mind.

Finally, Mr. President, I would direct tific research potential and science education programs at all levels in the mathematical, physical, medical, biological, engineering, social, and other sciences, by making contracts or other arrangements (including grants, loans, and other forms of assistance) to support such scientific and educational activities and to appraise the impact of research upon industrial development and upon the general welfare;

(2) to award, as provided in section 10, scholarships and graduate fellowships in the mathematical, physical, medical, biological, engineering, social, and other sciences;

(3) to foster the interchange of scientific information among scientists in the United States and foreign countries;

(4) to foster and support the development and use of computer and other scientific methods and technologies, primarily for research and education in the sciences;

(5) to evaluate the status and needs of the various sciences as evidenced by programs, projects, and studies undertaken by agencies of the Federal Government, by individuals, and by public and private research groups, employing by grant or contract such consulting services as it may deem necessary for the purpose of such evaluations; and to take into consideration the results of such evaluations in correlating the research and educational programs undertaken or supported by the Foundation with programs, projects, and studies undertaken by agencies of the Federal Government, by individuals, and by public and private research groups,

(d) The Board and the Director shall recommend and encourage the pursuit of national policies for the promotion of basic research and education in the sciences.

(e) In exercising the authority and discharging the functions referred to in the foregoing subsections, it shall be an objective of the Foundation to strengthen research and education in the sciences, including independent research by individuals, throughout education programs there and not about the Department of Education.

Mr. President, I think, although one might argue the scientific community is speaking with a vested interest, the unanimity of this vested interest has to carry a great deal of weight in this deliberation.

If we in the Congress and in the Government are going to ignore the recommendations of all of the people most expert in a given field, then we are going to do so at very great peril to the Nation.

Mr. President, initially, as late as April 10, 1978, the National Science Foundation was on record as opposing the transfer of its educational functions to the Department of Education. Since that time they have come into line with the administration position.

But let me quote from the April 10, 1978 letter by Richard Atkinson, Director of the National Science Foundation, to the President:

National Science Foundation,
Washington, D.C., April 10, 1978.

President,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. President: I agree with your view that a Department of Education could enhance the ability of the Federal Government to serve the cause of quality education for all of our citizens.

Given a well-conceived plan for a Department of Education, an argument can be made for transferring the National Science Foundation's (NSF) Science Education programs to that department. However, the new department, as proposed by the Reorganization Committee, does not have a discernible rationale and does little more than add the the attention of my colleagues to the testimony of Charles B. Saunders before the Subcommittee on Legislation and National Security, Committee on Government Operations, House of Representatives.

Mr. Saunders is vice president for governmental relations, American Council on Education, a council that represents many of the major associations and councils involved with education, particularly education at the college and university level.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of those associations be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

American Association of State Colleges and Universities.

American Council on Education.

Association of American Colleges.

Association of American Universities.

Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities.

Association of Jesuit Colleges and Universities.

Council for the Advancement of Small Colleges.

National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.

National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I quote briefly from Mr. Saunders' testimony:

H.R. 13343 would transfer a number of programs from other agencies to the new Department. We oppose transfer of the National Science Foundation's Education Directorate (or for that matter any other part of that appropriately independent Foundation), as provided in Section 305. Most members of the > higher education community believe that the location of the Education Directorate within the National Science Foundation affirms the importance of the interdependence of science education and scientific research. To separate the two would inevitably damage the quality of both, by depriving them of their mutually supportive relationship.

> These programs should be developed and administered with a sensitivity to the science and research environment on campus in which they will function. They should be staffed by professionals, some on temporary assignments from colleges and universities, who are familiar with existing NSF academic science research and training programs and with emerging educational needs and training opportunities. A staff in a separate Department, isolated from the Foundation's research environment, in our view, would neither bring the same perceptions and experience to these programs nor attract the quality of experienced individuals drawn to them by the unique research environment of the Foundation. We see no reason to disrupt the present relationship, with the reduced effectiveness which would be bound to occur, for the sake of adding another agency to the new Department of Education.

Mr. President, there is one consistent theme throughout everything that has been said by others on this issue. It is a theme I personally would reemphasize again and again.

Again quoting from Mr. Saunders, as well as others:

> The importance of the interdependence of science education and scientific research. To separate the two would inevitably damage the quality of both, by depriving them of their mutually supportive relationship.

Mr. President, I do not know what else be in a position to complement Department of Education activities by focusing on innovative projects. The new department will work closely with NSF.

Basic research is a highly important national investment, and NSF will pioneer some major new research projects in the physical and biological sciences over the next decade. During these years, the Department of Education will concentrate on translating the research information and findings to school-age students and their teachers.

Responsibility for encouraging more women, minorities and persons who are physically handicapped—all of whom are terribly underrepresented in scientific and technical careers, will also remain in the NSF.

Thus, this move will not take NSF out of those areas of priority to which Congress has designated in both authorizing and appropriation language.

The transfer of these programs was supported unanimously by the Governmental Affairs Committee. The committee's support includes that of Senator JOHN GLENN, whose subcommittee has jurisdiction over Government research joins with me in supporting this transfer.

The bill provides for an Office of Educational Research and Improvement. The science and education functions would be transferred intact to this Office. This Office will be involved in assisting educational research, development, and improvement. These science education programs transferred are concerned with schools systems, community colleges, and State departments of education. These are the institutions that will work closely with, and will be served by, the Department of Education. The priority and emphasis of improving science in our schools can be reinforced by establishing at the outset a strong and visible science unit in the Office of Educational Research and Improvement, established by S. 991.

In testimony before the committee Phil Smith, Assistant Director, Office of Science and Technology Policy testified that the transfer of these programs would offer distinct advantages in those cases where there is a desirability of implementing on a wide basis activities characterized by knowledge dissemination, the widespread introduction of new educational technologies and the training of professionals, such as teacher training programs. The programs transferred are consistent with this approach.

In summary, science education transfers from NSF, which represent less than 7 percent of NSF's entire budget, will not change the overall mission of the NSF.

Our transfer will assure visibility and status for science education, as Science education programs will be no less than one-fourth the size of the newly created "Research and Improvement Office."

The opportunity to influence and improve science education and related programs by their placement in the new Department will be increased. Programs relating to science education already existing in the Office of Education would can be said but to emphasize that that is the essential unanimous opinion of everybody who has been involved in science, scientific research, and scientific education.

I have been involved in all of those for most of my professional life. I am still involved in it. I cannot say too strongly to my colleagues that this is probably one of the most serious mistakes we are going to make if we continue along this line with the creation of the Department of Education.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. RIBICOFF addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BIDEN). The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I oppose the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico. It should be kept in mind, the total science education programs in NSF are $77.6 million. The programs transferred are $56.3 million of that amount—approximately 7 percent of the overall NSF budget this year. The programs transferred are concerned with faculty development, school and undergraduate programs, which include science teaching and curricula. The graduate research training and scientists-nonscientist communications programs and certain ethical, value and science policy issues which are applicable to NSF's broader agency mission would remain at NSF.

The transfer does not preclude the NSF from launching new science education initiatives. S. 991 specifically states that NSF's authority is not prohibited from initiating any new programs with respect to science education. NSF would be combined with NSF's programs to give science education even more prominence in the new Department. Committee report language assures close linkages between the Department of Education and NSF.

these activities and, because they are transferred intact, will be highly visible in this Office. Thus, the programs transferred fit well with the entire mission of this Office and with the new Department.

The education division now supports projects worth millions of dollars which deal with science education and curricular development, such as environmental education, metric education, and science and math projects. It supports research relating to teaching subjects including science, math, and the use of instructional technologies. For example, the Department of Education can be expected to assist with problems associated with the poor quality of science and mathematics programs in our schools, but only if it has the appropriate resources and scientifically trained staff—which this bill provides. The programs transferred to the new Department would help provide a unified focus in this area and will allow teachers and educators to work with the scientific community so that scientific curriculums and materials are well developed. Thus educators will be able to lend their support for science education.

We are aware of declining trends in scientific achievement among school-aged children. The National Assessment of Educational Progress reports this year that "in high schools, youth continue downward trend in science despite the ever-growing demands of a technological society."

The main responsibility for improving science knowledge and skills among all youths and adults will lie with our 16,000

NSF will continue its role to initiate science education programs deemed necessary, and to monitor the research and science education programs of all Federal agencies, including the Department of Education.

Continuation of graduate-level fellowships and traineeships and almost all of its science and society education programs (over $20 million of funds) would remain in NSF.

I urge defeat of the Schmitt amendment to delete this transfer.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement by the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), together with attachments, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY MR. KENNEDY

I comment on the pending amendment to remove from the Department of Education legislation those provisions which require the immediate transfer of science education programs from the National Science Foundation to the new Department.

The Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research, which I chair, has had the opportunity to review science education programs in considerable detail over a period of close to ten years. During that time we have heard extensive testimony on the accomplishments which have been made in science education through N.S.F. support, as well as on some areas where improvement still remains to be made.

Most recently, we heard testimony from a number of science education groups, from the Director of the National Science Board and from the Director of the National Science Foundation. They pointed out some very valid concerns with regard to the proposed transfer.

Following the hearings, the Subcommittee heard from a wide range of individuals and groups who expressed strong opposition to the immediate transfer of these programs. These groups include:

American Association for the Advancement of Science.

National Science Teachers Association.

American Association of State Colleges and Universities.

American Council on Education.

Association of American Colleges.

Association of Jesuit Colleges and Universities.

Council for the Advancement of Small Colleges.

National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.

National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

National Catholic Educational Association's College and University Department.

National Science Board.

Director, National Science Foundation.

Committee on Minorities in Engineering, National Research Council.

American Chemical Society.

Mathematical Association of America.

American Mathematical Society.

We have also been in touch with the Science Advisor to President Johnson, Dr. Donald Hornig; the Science Advisor to President Kennedy, Dr. Jerome Weisner; and the Science Advisor to President Nixon, Dr. Edward David. All have expressed their opposition to would be lost. This is a critical coupling for first rate science education development.

I would be glad to amplify these remarks should you so desire. I hope you can play the important role of maintaining science education programs where they can be most effective; namely, in the Science Foundation.

Yours sincerely,

EDWARD E. DAVID, JR.

ANOTHER GO AT FEDERAL EDUCATION

There is something beautiful and good in the vision of Cabinet rank for education. There is to be a seat at the table at last, in the heady company of defense, foreign affairs, and energy. There is a hopeful glimpse of new political power, built on a unified education constitutency. Such is the spell wrought by the sorcery of reorganization.

Whether a remodeled government architecture ensures more equality and vitality in education in the United States is by no means clear. To paraphrase Thomas Huxley, size is not grandeur and territory does not make an educated nation. In the past three decades, federal education priorities have zigged and zagged and it is hard to put a name to what has come out of them, although there is evidence that federal leverage played a large role in opening up educational opportunity and that science curricula took a turn for the better. But given the built-in aversion to federal authority over the education process, expectations for striking change were too optimistic. The President sees balkanization of federal responsibility as a problem, and to an extent he is right. But pretentious efforts at reorganization are unlikely to make a difference unless driven by new consensus strategies, which to date have not turned up.

education, the case for the latter would be stronger. Human resources make or break investment in research.

Science education is not a priority that we have outgrown. As the knowledge base expands, increasing pressure is put on teaching. Both the proficiency of instruction at the secondary level and the effectiveness and competence of career counseling have profound meanings for higher education. A public which is asked to cope with difficult problems of choice in matters of health, consumerism, energy, and environmental balance can hardly assess uncertainty in the absence of better science education. There is a large and vexing job to be done. Government, which calls most of the signals for science, should be the first to understand this.

Mr. KENNEDY. Moreover, earlier this month the Office of Technology Assessment, on whose Governing Board I serve, issued a report entitled "Impact of a Department of Education on Federal Science and Technology Activities". That report which was issued just a few days before the beginning of the floor debate in the Senate, raises some serious concerns about the impact of the proposed immediate transfer.

The following excerpt from our most recent Committee Report on scientific research and education programs summarizes our Committee's view of the problems which must be taken into account in considering the transfer of science education programs from the NSF to the Department of Education:

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

The creation of a separate Department of the proposed immediate transfer. The text of Dr. David's letter together with a recent editorial from Science magazine follows:

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE,
Florham Park, N.J., July 31, 1978.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY
U.S. Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: I am writing to urge you to oppose the reorganization legislation which would transfer NSF's principal science education programs to the new Department of Education.

Over the years, the Science Foundation has been quite successful in putting genuine science and mathematics into the school curriculum. The Foundation has also had a substantial beneficial effect on teaching at all levels. This effectiveness of the NSF Program is to be admired because of the narrow line they have to tread between federal and local authority in determining the curriculum content. As you well appreciate, NSF has not always avoided such politically-based pitfalls, but overall its performance has been remarkedly good in my opinion. Today there is a new role to be played by NSF in science education. It is that of educating the non-science student for living in a technologically-based world. This goal of technological literacy will in my opinion be even more difficult to achieve than bringing true science into the curriculum as NSF has already done.

I believe that the transfer of these programs to a new large Department of Education would submerge them to a low priority and relegate them to ineffectiveness. The primary concern of the education people is and will continue to be instructional techniques, teaching theory and educational evaluation, not the substance of new curriculum materials. The essential interaction between the NSF education programs and the research activities of the Foundation

If little is to be gained by reorganizing federal education programs, the next question is whether something is to be lost. It is not an idle question, given the jarring news that the National Science Foundation is to be stripped of most of its science education programs. Although science education in NSF is not what it once was, it still commands and deserves respect in the scientific community. The prospect of its assimiliation by the conglomerate department of education is unsettling, since no bill of particulars has been presented to show that a superagency would do more than distribute mediocrity uniformly.

Time was when science education made up half of the NSF budget, compared with only 8 percent of a larger budget now. If we understand the government's intentions, NSF's statutory charter for science education would not be revoked even though its programs would be handed off. Puzzling as that may be, what is even more troubling is the severing of science education from the major-purpose agency concerned with the state and progress of science. In a new education department dispensing $18 billion the forlorn science education component would amount to two-tenths of a percent. One recalls a cherished footnote in federal budgets: "Totals may not add due to rounding." It is hard to believe that so frail a unit in so vast an empire could compete effectively in a contest of priorities.

In the absence of wars and space competitions, the importance of science education may not seems impressive to the reorganization experts. But only weeks ago the President was stressing the importance of science to our principal national purposes and calling for a new surge of technological innovation. He was right on both counts. If scientific research is a necessary public investment, surely it follows that science education is an equally necessary investment. Indeed, if a choice had to be made between more dollars for research and greater efforts in science Education has potential for improving the quality of education and expanding educational opportunities. Nevertheless, the committee is concerned about the advisability of transferring the Nation Science Foundation's science education programs to the new Department. The committee will want to be assured that science education functions are placed where they can be of the greatest value and where they can be managed most effectively. Experience gained in almost three decades of funding science through the NSF shows that science education benefits greatly from close ties with basic and applied research. These ties must be retained if quality science education is to be achieved.

The National Science Board, in a statement regarding the role of science in the proposed Department of Education, has pointed out that activities in scientific research and science education are inextricably linked, and that science education can only be kept current when direct and continuous contact is maintained between the research and science education communities. Maintaining accuracy as scientific research reports and results are transformed into materials suitable for scientific instruction also requires close contact between the scientific research and science education communities. Well balanced programs with adequate numbers of well prepared students in appropriate courses at the elementary, secondary, undergraduate, and graduate levels are also required in order to insure that the Nation's scientific research effort does not falter.

Major successes with limited funds can be achieved only through careful agreement on objectives and personal communications among scientists and science educators. The committee is concerned that this balance may not be maintained in an agency with the divergent priorities and restraints that would be inherent in the much broader mission of general-purpose assistance to education.

The committee is concerned that science education might not receive sufficient emphasis in a large departmental setting. Federally supported science education efforts are a very small fraction of total educational costs funded at the national level. They account for less than one half of 1 percent of more than $17 billion in programs that are now planned for transfer to the new Department of Education. It is important that science education not be submerged or subordinated to other educational goals. Continued U.S. scientific and technological strength depend on a vigorous and healthy science education enterprise. To promote the necessary leverage to effect beneficial change, science education activities must have clear visibility in any reorganization of federally supported education activities. While these concerns could be met in a new Department of Education, they raise questions concerning the advisability of transferring the NSF science education programs to the new Department. For these reasons, the committee advises caution in reorganization actions involving the transfer of science education functions which are now the responsibility of the National Science Foundation.

The transfer of NSF's science education activities to a new Department would also have a dramatic effect on the distribution of NSF support. Science education programs account for total NSF support to more than 300 colleges and universities now participating in NSF activities. These institutions are widely dispersed geographically, and a transfer of the Foundation's science education activities to the new Department would significantly narrow the geographical distribution of NSF awards. NSF has used science education as a means for upgrading the capacity of academic institutions in various fields of science. These efforts have

I appreciate the effort the Committee has made to adjust the provisions of S. 991 to meet some of the concerns which have been raised. Nevertheless, I continue to feel that the Senate should work for final approval of legislation which does not include immediate transfer of science education programs. Some of the most persuasive arguments in support of this position follow:

(1) The transfer of science education programs from the National Science Foundation may result in reduced participation by the scientific community in the substance of science education programs. This participation has been a key element in the success of N.S.F.'s science education programs. It is carried out smoothly and effectively by the Foundation, which is in continuing contact with the Nation's leading experts in all fields of science. Mr. President. I am concerned that in the new Department this close cooperation will be difficult to achieve. The scientific research community is not expected to have the same kind of on-going contacts with the new Department that now exist with the N.S.F. And although the Committee report calls for continuation of this participation, this directive will be extremely difficult to implement.

(2) Science and science education should not be separated. The N.S.F. has been able to achieve significant improvements in science education because the Foundation is involved not only in the educational process but in new developments in all disciplines of science. The Foundation has a strong record in assuring that its efforts to stimulate pre-college and college students to pursue careers in science are undertaken in a manner which takes into account emerging fields of science and the need for a balanced scientific workforce. N.S.F. programs provide a continuum of encouragement beginning in Foundation have been moved forward with a minimum of partisan differences and have won wide support on both sides of the aisle. The scientific community, the public and experts in a wide range of science and science education fields have played key roles in assuring that N.S.F. programs respond not to partisan pressure but to needs evaluated and met through careful peer review and consultation with independent experts. This process, while it has not always been without short-comings, is a far better one than a process which may be susceptible to inappropriate intervention. The new Department may not provide this remarkable nonpartisan atmosphere and may result in a situation in which inappropriate intervention could threaten the integrity of science education.

(5) The N.S.F. Science Education Directorate is now headed by an educator with both scientific and educational credentials. The appointment of Dr. James Rutherford to be Assistant Director of N.S.F. for Science Education was a major step toward further strengthening these programs. Dr. Rutherford is highly respected in both the scientific research and education communities. Since he came to the Foundation, science education programs have increased their focus on a range of issues too long neglected. This new emphasis includes increased participation by minorities, women and handicapped in science. It includes a new awareness of the needs of precollege students—both those who will go on to careers in science and those who need a fundamental understanding of the principles of science in order to function effectively in a society in which science and technology are playing an increasing role. An interruption in this new emphasis and strong direction should be avoided in order to maintain the important been closely integrated with Foundation supported basic and applied research activities. These coordinated efforts have made it possible to involve these institutions in a wider range of NSF activities. Separating science education from the Foundation's research activities would seriously impair these complementary activities.

The committee recognizes that the structure and format of the new Department of Education might satisfy all of the above concerns. However, since the future strength of U.S. science is at stake in the proposed reorganization, the committee urges all involved to take note of the concerns expressed in this report. An objective should be to maintain a highly visible and strong science education program that will retain close ties with the U.S. scientific community.

Before proceeding to a more detailed discussion of the persuasive arguments which have been made against the proposed immediate transfer I would like to thank the distinguished and able Chairman of the Committee on Government Affairs (Senator Ribicoff) for the dedicated efforts that he and his staff have made to make S. 991 responsive to the concerns of scientists and science educators. His Committee Report makes it very clear that there will be a continuing role of N.S.F. in science education. The bill itself specifies that the following N.S.F. supported programs are to be exempt from the proposed transfer:

(1) fellowships and traineeships integral to the support of scientific research and development

(2) ethical, value, and science policy programs

(3) programs which communicate science information to nonscientists.

The bill maintains the N.S.F.'s statutory authority to initiate and conduct science education programs, and provides for consultation between the Secretary of the new Department and the Director of the N.S.F.

a student's earliest years and follow that student through graduate, post-graduate and research activities. I am concerned that the proposal to place graduate and undergraduate science education programs in separate agencies of government will stand in the way of the development of the scientific human resources we need to maintain our nation's preeminent position in scientific research.

(3) N.S.F.'s pre-college and college science education programs have helped to strengthen the awareness of the scientific research community of the need for stronger ties and cooperation with the public as a whole. In the past, the scientific research community has not placed high priority on the participation of non-scientists or on the need to increase public understanding of the impact of science and technology. This is a responsibility to which the research community is now beginning to respond. In recent years, significant steps have been taken towards resolving the lack of communication which has characterized relationships between scientists and non-scientists. An important element in that process has been the presence in the N.S.F. of programs which focus on the needs of persons who require a sound understanding of scientific principles—even though they may not plan to go on to careers in science. To move these programs—programs conducted primarily in two and four year colleges—away from the N.S.F. and out of the immediate sphere of concern of the scientific community may stand in the way of continued progress in the constructive dialogue which has developed in recent years.

(4) the statute of N.S.F. as an independent agency contributes importantly to the ability of science education and research programs to be free of partisan considerations. Through its 25 year history as an independent agency, Its Director serves a 6 year term. The legislation authorizing its programs and their implementation by the progress which has been made.

(6) The $56 million in N.S.F. science education programs proposed for transfer in the Committee bill would have little or no leverage or visibility in a Department with a budget of close to $20 billion. The science education program is a small one. It has been able to maintain its momentum in the N.S.F.—a much smaller agency than the agency envisioned in the Committee bill. Placing this small program in a very large agency may result in a lack of oversight and weak direction. The science education programs may be lost in the efforts of the Congress and the Executive Branch to come to grips with a new multi-billion dollar agency. This situation could seriously affect the continued progress of science education and the ability to monitor emerging needs.

(7) The N.S.F. Act assigns N.S.F. the responsibility for science education. Without a change in the enabling legislation, a shift of N.S.F.'s operating programs could place N.S.F. in an untenable position. N.S.F. will continue to be responsible for science education—but will have virtually no programs through which to carry out that responsibility. This split in authority could cause significant problems in assuring a concerted effort to strengthen science education—and may make it impossible for N.S.F. to carry out its statutory mandate.

(8) The proposed transfer is not essential to the success of the new Department and could be accomplished once the new Department is in place and the future of science education programs could be better assured. The success of the new $20 billion Department does not hinge on whether or not $56 million in science education programs become a part of its authority at the outset. A hasty transfer may result in a situation in which the transferred science education programs are brought to a standstill for a period of 12 to 18 months while the new Department gets underway. There is no compelling reason for this kind of interruption. Once the new Department is established, it may be possible to move the science education programs smoothly to it, without the kind of disruption which would be caused by an immediate transfer. This nation cannot afford an interruption in the improvement of science education—particularly when transfer at a later time could be accomplished without this kind of disruption.

I have discussed these concerns with the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs. He has assured me that every effort will be made to respond to them.

We have agreed that a good opportunity to deal with these issues, rather than through the amendment being offered today, would be in the House-Senate Conference on S. 991 and the companion bill in the House has eliminated the N.S.F. from the new Department. This was done in the House by roll call vote in Subcommittee and reaffirmed by a roll call vote in the full Committee.

I want, at this time, to give my full support to the efforts of Senator Ribicoff to go into that Conference with the most comprehensive legislation possible. The pending amendment would remove one key element from the agenda for negotiation with the House. I do not support this course.

Rather, I urge the Chairman and the Senate Conferees, if we are successful in turning back the pending amendment, to evaluate carefully the position taken by the House when they go to Conference. It is my own view, as well as the view of virtually every science educator with whom I have spoken, that the correct policy position would be one which resulted in a final bill which did not require immediate transfer of science education programs to the new Department.

I hope this objective can be achieved tions." The court said these functions are those "which governments are created to provide, services which the States have traditionally afforded their citizens." (Usery, 426 U.S. 833, 851, 852 (1976).) No tradition in this country is stronger than local control over schools, and no local governmental function in America is more traditional than education. Over the past 25 years, education has commanded the largest single share of State and local governmental expenditures—38 percent. It should be made explicitly clear that the intention of S. 991 is to preserve the prerogative of the traditional role of education as a function of State and local governments and private institutions.

There are currently approximately 300 Federal education programs scattered throughout 40 Federal agencies. In creating a Cabinet Department of Education it is hoped that the management and coordination of these programs can be substantially improved and ease the burden on the State and local governments of the multiple, duplicative, and often conflicting regulations which have resulted from this fragmentation of the education effort. It should be noted, however, that effective management does not mean more control. The responsibility for education policy and curriculum will remain at State, local, and private levels. The rights of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic education institutions shall be maintained and protected in the areas of program content and administration of pro- Governmental Affairs Committee and chief architect of this bill has once again demonstrated his leadership ability and his continuing concern with the important issue of education. I believe my able colleague Senator Danforth would also like to address the concern of local control over education, and following his remarks, I would be interested in the chairman's observations on this important matter.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, it is my hope that in this colloquy which I hope will transpire with both the majority and minority managers of the bill, we can establish a clear legislative history on this bill.

On August 6, an article appeared in the Washington Post entitled "Uncle Sam's Growing Clout in the Classroom." The subtitle was "Creating a New Department as a Backdoor Way To Establish a U.S. Responsibility for Education Itself."

The article begins as follows:

> With virtually no public debate over the central issue at stake, the Carter administration and the Congress are moving toward creating a federal department of education with the potential to transform the way education is governed by the United States.
> Contrary to widespread belief, the proposed department is not chiefly an issue of reorganizing or consolidating federal education efforts, of increasing the time or money spent on education, or of deciding which exthrough Conference with the House, after the Senate conferees have had the opportunity to review the information which has been developed since the Committee's initial action on S. 991.

I urge my colleagues who support the concept of a Department of Education to join in the position I have taken with regard to resolving the science education issue in conference.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I have comments that probably would take 3 or 4 minutes. I will be happy, if there is any time pressure on our colleagues, to yield for a colloquy at this time.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, during consideration of S. 991 in the Governmental Affairs Committee, I was pleased that my colleagues unanimously consented to amendments offered by Senator DANFORTH and myself to clarify the language in the bill to assure the rights and prerogatives of State and local governments in the educational process. There has been a long tradition in this Nation of local control over education. This tradition is guaranteed by the constitutional requirements of the 10th amendment, which have been underscored by the Supreme Court in the case of National League of Cities versus Usery. In that case the justices held that the States have the freedom under the 10th amendment "to structure integral operations in areas of traditional governmental functions grams as well.

A Cabinet-level Department of Education should supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private, public, and nonpublic institutions, education research institutions, community organizations, and parents and students to improve the quality of education for all Americans. This is where the resources at the disposal of the Federal Government can best be used. The bill establishes an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The purpose of this council is to conduct studies and make recommendations to the Secretary and the President concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education. It will serve as a forum to bring the opinions and ideas of those persons involved in the educational process to the attention of the Department. From this perspective the Council is a valuable component of the new Department to supplement and complement State and local efforts to meet the Nation's education needs.

I can think of nothing else that so affects all Americans as education. I can think of no other area where Americans insist more upon a strong local control than education. Education is vital to our country's sustenance and well-being. Education is crucial for good government as it provides the road for an informed public which is the key to an effective democracy. I believe that education is a priority which deserves Cabinet-level status and thus I have cosponsored this bill. My distinguished colleague Mr. RIBICOFF, as chairman of the isting agency should or should not be absorbed by a new department. Establishing a Cabinet-level department is a backdoor way of creating a national education policy, of breaking with the long tradition of a limited federal involvement in education and of virtually no federal responsibility for schools and colleges themselves.

Mr. President, it is my hope in this colloquy to establish clearly the fact that this article is not true; that it is absolutely not correct; that, as a matter of fact, this question was covered very carefully in committee hearings and during the markup; that Senator ROTH offered an amendment to the bill which provided that the Federal Government is available to assist and supplement, but never supplant State and local and tribal governments in developing educational policies.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Senator is absolutely correct. The article has no basis whatsoever.

As the chief author of this bill, it was never my intention, and still is not my intention, to carry forward the thesis made by the writer of that article. I reject that completely. Wherever that comes from, it certainly does not come from the author of the bill or the respective cosponsors.

There is no question of the contribution that the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Missouri have made. It is clearly set forth. The colloquy we have will reemphasize our positions.

I thank the Senators for their contribution. Before we are through with the colloquy, the record and the legislative history will reject clearly the thesis in the article just quoted.

Mr. DANFORTH. I want to make clear, speaking for one Senator who ended up voting to report the bill out of the Governmental Affairs Committee and who will vote for the bill on final passage, that this was the main concern I had, going into consideration of the bill: That by consolidating the Federal effort on education we were somehow vesting the Federal Government with a greater role in making decisions for education which heretofore had been made at the local level.

And that is something that I think would be a very, very bad step in the wrong direction.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I thank both Senators ROTH and DANFORTH for their outstanding contribution in further clarifying the intergovernmental functions of the Department and in reaffirming the fundamental notions upon which the Department will be founded.

S. 991 specifically states:

> The primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with State, local, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities and families.

The purpose of the bill states that the Department of Education will supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational and educational research institutions, parents, and students.

In addition to the Council the intergovernmental relations functions of the Department will be performed by an Assistant Secretary who will have direct access to the Secretary and will work with the Council. These structures will help to insure that Federal policies recognize that education is primarily a State and local responsibility and that State and local governments have a strong voice in determining Federal education objectives.

The Department will lead to improved assistance and support for education programs at the State and local levels by increasing the visibility and status of education and improving the management and coordination of education programs. It will also provide a mechanism where input can be provided from among citizens, particularly parents and students. One of the major functions of the Department will be to assess parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required and to encourage the involvement of parents, students, and the public and the implementation and development of all the Department's programs.

I believe no other groups fear Federal encroachment in the area of education more than parents, teachers, students, and administrators—those people closest to education. Such groups as the American Association of University Professors, American Association of School Administrators, National Committee for Citizens in Education, National Governors Association, National School Boards

Mr. ROTH. I say to Senator RIBICOFF, from our colloquy on the subject of local control of the educational process, I am given to understand and wish to make explicitly clear for all of those persons who have an intense interest in this subject that:

First. The formulation of policies in our schools in regard to education is the right and responsibility of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational and educational research institutions, parents, and students and not the Federal Government.

Second. The choice of curriculums is the right and responsibility of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational and educational research institutions, parents, and students and not the Federal Government.

Third. The administration of educational programs in our schools is the right and responsibility of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational and educational research institutions, parents, and students and not the Federal Government.

Fourth. The choice of program content is the right and responsibility of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational and educational research institutions, parents, and students.

Fifth. Educational objectives in our schools are to be determined by State, local, and tribal governments, the private tutions, parents and students to improve the quality of education. This is done acknowledging the right of these entities to formulate policies, choose curricula, decide administrative questions, and choose program content with respect to their educational programs.

The Federal presence in education does not mean control. Local control of schools is traditional and historical. The Federal Government is involved in assisting State and local governments to insure equal opportunity and equal access to education programs. It provides assistance to States and localities for programs for the disadvantaged and handicapped. It funds programs to assist with educational research, environmental education, community education, and provides assistance to needy children.

Senators ROTH and DANFORTH improved in the committee's markup the functions and purposes of the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council established in the bill provides a vehicle to improve Federal-State and Federal-local relations in education programs. The Council will provide a forum for representatives of State and local government to discuss and impact on Federal education programs and policies. Its representatives would be 22 nonpartisan representatives from State and local government, State and local education agencies, and private citizens. It will review the impact of Federal education policies, including rules and regulations, upon State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

Association, National Student Association, and National Student Lobby support the Department. These groups do not fear that a Cabinet Department of Education means Federal encroachment upon their prerogatives to develop their own curriculum and policies. The National Congress of Parents and Teachers' (PTA) testimony on the Department of Education legislation reflects the importance as well as the limitations of the Federal involvement in education.

> The PTA has long endorsed the concept of the local control of education and continues its support of this concept. The Federal role in education, however, has assumed increasing importance since the passage, in 1965, of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. Since then the nature and extent of Federal involvement in education has changed. Far from being an obstacle to the local control of education, the National PTA feels that the establishment of a Department of Education would produce successful cooperation among Federal, state, and local education agencies in their appropriate roles.
> The establishment of a Department of Education would make clear the lines of Federal responsibility and authority in the educational effort. It would make it more possible for parents, educators, and other citizens . . . to make [education programs] more fully responsive to their needs.

A Department of Education will increase accountability for education—it will provide a mechanism for State and local governments to impact upon administration of Federal education programs—it will, in other words, provide for improved management of Federal programs—it will not in any way lead to Federal control or dominance of education.

sector, public and nonpublic educational and educational research institutions, parents, and students and not the Federal Government.

Sixth. And finally, in the establishment of a separate Cabinet-level Department of Education we are in no way suggesting, condoning, or implementing and entity to exercise Federal influence over the formulation of policies, choice of curricula, administration of programs, choice of educational objectives and program content, or anything which could be construed as the establishment of a national educational policy.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Yes, that is correct. I agree with the Senator that education is a State and local matter. It is not the intent of this bill, nor will this bill change the present intergovernmental relationship in education. The Government does of course, have special responsibilities in operating schools for Indians and dependents of military personnel where education is not otherwise available. It does not seek to change or enlarge the Federal Government's role in education in any way or to erode State or local control.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I wish to enter into this colloquy very briefly, if the Senator will yield on my time, because I think it is far one-sided, and I commend the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Missouri for their initiatives in this area.

I think it is exactly an appropriate initiative and I support their initiative wholeheartedly and would have if I had been in the committee. However, I am afraid they are doomed to failure, because they established purposes in this bill that are completely inconsistent with the statutory language in the bill, as well as the creation of a new bureaucracy.

They think HEW has been overzealous. Wait until they have the Cabinet-level Department doing the same thing. I hope they are right, but I am fraid they are going to be wrong. The bill and the bureaucracy are just inconsistent with the kind of colloquy that has just taken place.

I am sorry to add that downbeat note to a very positive colloquy, but I just am seriously concerned that it will not come about the way these Senators hope it will.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. ROTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I associate myself with the remarks of the Senators from Missouri and the Senator from Delaware.

As a former mayor, I share their concerns for the interference of Federal agencies with local government.

One of the most difficult things I had to deal with was the various agencies like HUD and HEW, so I want to emphasize how much concern I have about the creation of this new department, and if it does make possible more interference.

The Senator from Delaware mentioned the Fair Labor Standards Act Amendments of 1974 that were taken to court. I came back as the first vice president of the National League of Cities, lobbied really supplement, complement, and assist local governments.

The Danforth-Roth amendments were adopted unanimously by the committee. If you know the makeup of the Governmental Affairs Committee, I believe it is the least doctrinaire of any committee in Congress, with all due respect to the other committees. It is a committee that is concerned with realities. It is concerned with organization. It is concerned with the encroachment of the Federal Government on localities and States.

We do work out these problems, and you will find that practically all the legislation that comes out of our committee comes out unanimously because we worked out a basic common philosophy.

The contribution of the Senator from Delaware and the contribution of the Senator from Missouri was adopted.

As you listen to the colloquy—and I think even the fears of the Senator from New Mexico, Senator SCHMITT, who is concerned with what is happening at the present time with education—those complaints should be lodged against the present HEW.

One of the concerns of the Senator from Washington, Senator MAGNUSON, as expressed earlier in the evening, was due to the fact that, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations that always had jurisdiction over HEW appropriations, his concern was with the way these problems were handled or adopted. As I stated then, and still state, he is the man who has been after me more than anyone in the Senate to do something aimed at recruiting and training scientific researchers remain in NSF. Only those programs aimed at students and teachers at the elementary, secondary, and postsecondary levels will be transferred.

The reason why these particular programs should be transferred is the need to upgrade and expand science education in our schools, particularly at the elementary and secondary levels. Presently, this effort is divided between the Office of Education in HEW and the Science Directorate in NSF. This division has led to a fragmentation of the Federal effort directed at science education.

At a time when our country is faced with many problems which require technical and scientific answers, for example, our search for alternative energy sources, we need better coordination of Federal science education programs if we are to develop the scientists and researchers who will be needed.

Placing these programs in one department will greatly facilitate the achievement of this goal.

Mr. President, the legislation which established the Office of Science and Technology Policy provided a role for the OSTP Director in assessing the strength of science and technology, and also the education and training of scientific personnel and the citizens of a nation highly dependent on science and technology in all of its activities.

In testimony before the Governmental Affairs Committee on April 18, 1978, Congress not to impose those new work rules on local government. They turned us down.

It bothered me so much that I went home and decided I was going to start a suit in Salt Lake City and took it to the National League of Cities. So I was very familiar with that suit. I originated it in the National League of Cities, and I was fortunate to have it result in our favor in the U.S. Supreme Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I apologize to the Senator for interrupting, but can we find out on whose time he is speaking?

Mr. GARN. The Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware does not control the time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I am willing to yield to the Senator on my time. Have I used up my time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has 10 minutes remaining on this amendment.

Mr. GARN. I will only take 30 seconds to say, on whomsoever time this is, that I support this view and I hope the new department, when it is created, will not infringe more on the right of local governments. The revenue-sharing approach does make a great deal more sense than the control that goes with categorical programs.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, may I comment that the Senators from Delaware and Missouri had the findings and purposes of the original bill changed to assure that local control would be preeminent, and this new department would and to have a separate Department of Education so that we can remedy some of the defects of education with respect to HEW. The way to do it was to do it this way.

I think that by enactment of this bill, we will have a very substantial improvement. The irony is that what the Senator from New Mexico complains about should be lodged really against the present Department of HEW in the way education is presently treated.

I think what we have done in the bill is to obviate some of his concerns, and that is why you will find the strong support of the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Missouri, who are as concerned with these problems as the distinguished Senator from Utah and the Senator from New Mexico and, may I say, the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. GARN. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I should now like to comment on the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, I do oppose the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from New Mexico to delete the transfer of the science education programs.

I would like to remind my colleagues that the entire Science Directorate of the National Science Foundation is not being transferred, as was originally proposed. Following our hearings on this issue, the committee recommended that the research and training programs Philip M. Smith, Assistant Director, Office of Science and Technology Policy, strongly supported including science education in the Department of Education. He said:

> We in OSTP were led to conclude that a broadly based Department of Education such as that proposed in S. 991 and which is proposed by the President, would offer very distinct advantages in those cases where there is a desirability of implementing on a wide basis activities characterized by knowledge dissemination, the widespread introduction of new educational technologies, the training of professionals such as teacher training programs, or special assistance programs to help improve the opportunities for sectors of our society such as minorities, women and the handicapped. The widespread implementation or dissemination of either education or research, especially applied research, has never been a major function at the NSF. The NSF Act, in fact, prohibits such activities, thus focusing the NSF or its primary role—the one that it fulfills with a high degree of excellence—namely the support of innovative, experimental projects in basic and applied research and in science education. We have concluded that it is desirable to have a continuing role for NSF in those programs most closely related to science such as the fellowships or those programs where there is a close tie between science and learning. We expect therefore that the NSF will have a continuing and important role in educational research specifically directed at science, knowledge and understanding for both formal education and in broader education of our citizenry concerning science and technology.

For the reasons given I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment, although I do so with some concern always because my distinguished colleague is a preeminent expert in the field of science and technology. However, I would in this case defer to those who are experts in the field of education.

Having lived through the experience of seeing what can be done to strengthen the role of science and technology in our entire educational process, that it should be an integrated whole, I feel that a Department of Education would be incomplete if we did not make this particular transfer.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I appreciate the colloquy that has occurred and the statement just made by the Senator from Illinois. I feel that I not only personally have been involved in science and technology, I have been a part of the science education system ever since I can remember. That system has been closely integrated with science and scientific research.

To sever that integration, as will almost certainly happen with the cleavage as is proposed in the bill before us, will, I think, only accelerate the downward trend that has been taking place in the deterioration in the quality of basic science, mathematical education within our elementary and secondary school system.

That downward trend, by the way, coincides directly with increased Federal involvement, both monetary and in terms of control. I see no way that immersing science in a new fledgling Cabinet-level bureaucracy is going to do anything but make matters worse.

I realize that is a judgment call, but I think it is a judgment call based on field is revenue sharing, the administrative costs of which are one-thirtieth of 1 percent. That I think is an example of what can be done if we really set our minds to granting funds but without strings and without controls.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at that point, I think that is a very important point to make because it has been something of a tradition of the Federal Government in its distribution of funds to condition the granting of funds to local governments on local governments' meeting certain requirements and, as a matter of fact, in the field of supporting local education some of those requirements have at times been really ridiculous. For example, prohibitions against boy-girl choirs or father-and-son picnics, and that sort of thing.

It seems to me to be an almost irresistible impulse for Federal agencies to condition their assistance to local governments or to local school boards on meeting certain requirements that we in Washington may think desirable but that people in the local school districts think are far from desirable, and I hope that this bill in no way could possibly be construed as in any way expanding the opportunity of a Federal department or Federal officers to manipulate decisions which really should be made at the local level.

Mr. PERCY. In this particular case, I point out a fact that my distinguished colleague from Missouri well knows. We have the most unique possible situation experience in the outside world of science education rather than on the judgment of the Washington community, and that community that has the most to gain from their own vested interest, the educators in this kind of transfer.

So I strongly recommend to my colleagues that they support my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. SCHMITT. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time. I move that the amendment be laid on the table, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a comment, the Senator from Illinois would certainly have not put his name to this legislation if there were the vestige of possibility that the events outlined in the article that has been read could possibly occur.

The Senator from Illinois has always felt that additional financial assistance is required because there is a ceiling on how much you can extract from property owners. There is a limit on how much you can get, how high you can take other taxes that are levied at the local and State level, and we do have a 90-percent Federal monopoly on the progressive income taxation system in this country.

The Senator from Illinois has constantly used the revenue-sharing principle we do what we can do best at the Federal level. We raise money extraordinarily well. We ought to grant that money with the least strings attached. The absolute preeminent program in this in the creation of this department because the author of the legislation who has worked so long on it is the floor manager of the bill and not only that but he was a former Secretary of HEW in the executive branch of Government. The legislative history that we are now making is being made by a man who has been on both sides of the fence, the executive branch and the legislative branch, and his imprint and his oversight over this activity and this creation of this new department will be an extraordinary opportunity for us to see that the intent of Congress is fully carried out.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the complaints and the concerns of the Senator from Missouri are addressed to the present HEW that is giving these guidelines and conditions and not the Department of Education, so it is in existence without the Department. What we have done in creating this Department is spell out specifically our concerns, our protections, and our affirmations of local control. So once this Department is created with this legislation, the language, the report, and the legislative history, we are really in a position to assure that the mistakes that HEW is guilty of in, I think, their overzealous grab for power will be eliminated, and I think it is being accomplished on the floor right now.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the floor managers.

On the basis of these representations and on the basis of the amendment that Senator ROTH offered successfully in the Governmental Affairs Committee I am supporting the bill.

Mr. PERCY. I only add this to Senator ROTH's initiative in this regard. The bill does establish an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The very purpose of it would be to conduct studies, make recommendations to the Secretary, the President, and Congress for improving the intergovernmental system for developing and carrying out educational policies. But represented there would obviously be the various layers of government, Federal, State, and local, tribal governments, public and nonpublic institutions, communities, parents and students, who must be participants in the Federal education process.

The Federal Government role is one of many roles, not the least of which is our dependence upon family structures and organizations, parent-teachers associations, and others, the assets of which we simply do not want to destroy. We want to enhance those, but again add a sense of direction and a focus and a sense of importance by the creation of a full department to put high priority on education, far higher than it is now.

I hope to overcome some of the great problems we have had with a multiplicity of categorical programs that force educational institutions at the local and State levels to twist and conform their structure to what the Federal Government apparently in its omniscience wants them to do.

It should be the other way around. We should be, in a sense, greatly responsive to the leadership we have at the local level, but certainly not be a director.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. The amendment is as follows:

On page 36, beginning with line 19, strike out through line 10 on page 115 and insert the following: That this Act may be cited as the "Department of Education Study Act of 1978".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) education is fundamental to the development of the individual and to the growth of the Nation;

(2) the current structure of the executive branch fails to give adequate recognition to the importance of education;

(3) the responsibility for education has and must continue to reside primarily with State, local, and tribal governments, public and non-public institutions, communities, and families;

(4) there is a continuing need to insure equality of educational opportunity, and to improve the quality of education; and

(5) the number, fragmentation, and complexity of Federal education programs have created management problems at the Federal, State, local, and institutional levels.

STUDY BY THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF EDUCATION

SEC. 3. (a) The Director of the National Institute of Education (hereinafter referred to as the "Director") is authorized and directed to undertake a thorough evaluation and study concerning the organization of education and education related programs within the Federal government. The study shall specifically examine the need for a separate cabinet level department devoted to eucation and education-related programs. The study shall examine—

(1) the effect of the establishment of a cabinet level department on State and local control of education;

(2) efforts for equal educational opportunity, including the appropriate Federal final report to the Congress. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Director shall submit the report directly to the Congress without prior review by any officer or employee outside the National Institute of Education.

FUNDING

SEC. 3. Amounts necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act shall be transferred to the National Institute of Education from funds appropriated to the President for contingent expenses.

Amend the title so as to read: A bill to require the Director of the National Institute of Education to conduct a study concerning the establishment of a department of education.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, the amendment to S. 991 which I am offering reflects my lifelong professional and conscientious concern with the creation of a Department of Education. It is my understanding that the bill has the enthusiastic support of President Carter, the somewhat less than enthusiastic support of Secretary Califano and—most important—the support of 52 Members of the Senate. I am, told, however, that the situation in the House is quite different and that in the other Chamber the forces opposing the bill will probably prevail. I wish them luck because I, too, feel obliged to oppose this bill, at least at the present time.

Some of my colleagues may not be aware that the United States had a Federal Department of Education before. Its record was certainly not inspiring. Created by legislation in 1867, it was headed by Henry Barnard, one of America's foremost spokesmen for education.

PROXMIRE). The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from California has asked to move ahead in sequence prior to the introduction of my next amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from California be considered at this time without prejudice to the time agreement relative to my amendment No. 3619, which would normally be pending at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from California is recognized.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1952

(Purpose: To require the Director of the National Institute of Education to conduct a study concerning the establishment of a department of education)

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I am most grateful to my distinguished colleague from New Mexico for his consideration in this matter.

I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1952.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I ask unanimous consent that further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

structure for insuring such efforts;

(3) the relationship between education programs and programs relating to vocational rehabilitation and training and child nutrition;

(4) the special relationship between the Federal government and Indian peoples and the maintenance and protection of that relationship with respect to educational services;

(5) methods for the promotion by the Federal government of quality education and education relevant to individual needs, with a special emphasis on basic skill development;

(6) the improvement of effective partnerships among Federal, State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and non-public institutions, community organizations, and families in order to improve the vitality and quality of education; and

(7) such other issues and areas as the Director finds to be appropriate.

(b)(1) Within 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Director shall submit to the Congress a plan for the study required under this section. The Director shall deliver such plan to both Houses of Congress on the same day and to each House while it is in session. The Director shall not commence the study required under this section until the first day after the close of the first period of thirty calendar days of continuous session of Congress after the date of the delivery of such plan to the Congress.

(2) For purposes of paragraph (1)—

(A) continuity of session is broken only by an adjournment of Congress sine die; and

(B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the thirty day period.

(c) Within one year after the date of submission of the plan to the Congress under subsection (b), the Director shall make a

The Department, however, accomplished so little that within a short time, it was reduced to the status of a bureau in the Department of the Interior. The experiences of that time may not be relevant today, but this first failure is certainly not a good omen.

Mr. President, the issue emerged again in 1923 when a congressional Joint Committee on Reorganization published a report that called for a Department of Education and relief. President Harding, as well as President Coolidge, endorsed the report, but Congress decided to take no further action. The idea of a Department of Education came up again in 1964 when President Johnson appointed a task force on Government reorganization. Since that time, all of the studies of the issue have reached negative conclusions. Among them were the Corson study of HEW and the Heineman Task Force study, both completed in 1966 and the Ash Council study reported in 1971.

So far, Mr. President, I have not a single scholarly study which suggests that the creation of a Department of Education at this time would be a desirable step. Among educators, the issue has, of course, been discussed for many years, and I always had a great interest in the topic. It, therefore, came as a surprise to me to see how this terribly important question has been approached by the Senate. Under the rules of this august body, the Governmental Affairs Committee has considered and reported S. 991. I was given the opportunity to read some of the extensive testimonies which I found quite unconvincing. There were also some modest efforts—I believe from the Republican side—to refer the bill subsequently to the Human Resources Committee where the subject could have been explored in more depth. For reasons unknown to me, there were some consultations, but the referral did not take place.

Mr. President, I wish to go on record as protesting a procedure by means of which the Committee on Human Resources was entirely omitted from the consideration of this very, very important matter which has to do with education. I though the bill, S. 991, had to do, among other things, centrally with education, but it was just skipped over.

As a result, Mr. President, I find myself today in the position of having to vote without adequate information on an issue which is of great concern to me. There can be no doubt that we have serious and complex problems in this general area. Our national efforts to improve public education have been largely ineffective. Federal outlays for education in the last 10 years have tripled while at the same time, our educational standards have deteriorated even further. Is the creation of a Department of Education going to be the answer? I frankly do not know. Moreover, I imagine the great majority of my colleagues do not have the answer, either. It is precisely for this reason that my amendment has been introduced.

Mr. President, before asking for a vote, I want to mention my principal reservations about this bill. The most fundamental one, of course, pertains to bill state that "the Department of Education will supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, and so forth." The crucial questions how policies will be arrived at and under whose authority policy decisions for all the States will be made are left open.

Mr. President, our public education is built upon a system of control by local school boards. The impact of a Federal Department of Education on the existing structure is hardly mentioned and not seriously discussed in this strange bill. Moreover, to the best of my knowledge, none of the plans to create a new department addresses this crucial and complex question.

What then, are the respective roles of the Federal Government and of the States in establishing educational policies going to be? I do not believe anybody in this Chamber is able to offer a clear and unequivocal answer. Have the supporters of this bill given any thought to the significant fact that the United States has not a single Cabinet-level department which is responsible for an area that the Constitution has left to the States? I wonder.

As indicated, Mr. President, the Federal Government has found a method of getting around this important provision in our Constitution by lavishly distributing money with categorical strings attached. In other words, the objections of the States to Federal involvement were usually silenced by increased funds. But concerned with all levels of education generally feel that they have been inadequately consulted and even ignored in considering the design of legislation and the development of regulations affecting the programs for which they have primary responsibility."

Is it not irresponsible to set up a Department of Education before this thorny and fundamental conflict has been resolved? Are we not putting the cart before the horse?

Mr. President, there is one more point I would like to make. Supporters of the bill argue that there are about 300 separate Federal educational programs spread over 40 different departments and agencies with a total expenditure of about $25 billion. Only about 120 of these programs are currently administered by HEW. It is asserted that by putting most of the Federal educational programs under one roof, we will increase coordination and accountability in education programs. This argument has some superficial appeal, but it disregards the fact that there were excellent reasons for assigning these programs to the places where they presently are. These reasons are equally valid today.

There are good reasons why child nutrition and the USDA graduate school should be a responsibility of the Department of Agriculture. It is equally logical why the educational programs of the Bureau of Indian Affairs ought to be administered by the Department of the Interior. There are excellent reasons why overseas dependent schools should be the Federal role in the field of education. Article I, section 8 of the Constitution lists the powers given to Congress. As we all know, the power to regulate education is not among them. We also know that the Federal Government, regardless of constitutional restrictions, has often been able to encroach on States rights. The reasons why this was done were actually honorable. When millions of GI's returned after the Second World War, the GI bill of rights was the logical answer to the threat of widespread unemployment. The post-sputnik programs supported science education, teacher preparation and graduate education. They were enacted in the fifties under the National Defense Education Act as parts of America's defense efforts. And when the enforcement of civil rights and the war on poverty became national goals, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 became the tool to implement national policies. In all of these huge programs, aid to education was an incidental aspect. The problem of education policy did not come up, nor was there a need to the fundamental question who actually would make policy.

Mr. President, I am obliged to point out that the drafters of S. 991 sidestepped this issue of the Federal role in education. On one hand, they expressly say that "the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with State, local, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities, and families."

On the other hand, the authors of the let us not forget, the conflict remains. There is a tendency on the Hill to pay lipservice to the relevant basic prerogatives of the States. At the same time, the 50 States of the Union remain very much aware of these prerogatives and will promptly resist transgressions against them wherever and whenever they might be. This year, I personally had a significant experience in this regard when I recently attempted to introduce legislation authorizing voluntary—not compulsory—national tests in reading, writing, and arithmetic. Voluntary tests, Mr. President. The States and individual school boards could have used or rejected the tests. Up went a hue and cry that the Federal Government was trying to take over education. Today, they cried, the tests would be voluntary, tomorrow obligatory, and the next step, there would be nationally mandated curricula. I am citing the example because it shows the prevailing complex conditions.

They do not want Federal intervention in education, even supplying of voluntary tests for achievement and competency, saying that is going to lead to Federal control of education, and now we want to set up a Federal Department of Education.

The American Council on Education offers the following significant comment in this regard: "The Federal Government is perceived by various state officials as contributing some 8 percent of elementary and secondary school budgets and behaving as if it were the senior and managing partner of the educational enterprise. Governors, legislators, chief State school officers, and State boards under Defense and so on.

Mr. President, I have, so far, seen no unbiased scholarly analysis which examines the pros and cons of the suggested transfers. It should be clear to any objective observer that by transferring overseas dependent schools to a new agency, we create the problem of how to coordinate this program with the Department of Defense. By transferring science education programs, we create a problem for the National Science Foundation and by moving the responsibility for college housing construction loans, we make operations more difficult for HUD. These are only a few examples. The point I am trying to make is that the advantages and disadvantages of the transfers have not been properly and systematically studied. We have seen contradictory and often politically motivated testimonies, but no systematic and distinterested analysis of the complex issues involved.

Mr. President, once the suggested study has been made, I may still be able to come out in favor of a Department of Education. There can be no question that our national educational efforts ought to be reviewed and strengthened. We are spending, on the Federal level, about $20 billion annually for education and Johnny still cannot read. Clearly, something is wrong. I believe a thorough and extensive examination of the issue is urgently needed and this is what my amendment, if accepted, would accomplish. It seems to me that the creation of a Department of Education without such an inquiry would simply be a bureaucratic escape from reality.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays and I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from California is through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield the floor?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Yes, indeed.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I have the highest respect and admiration for the distinguished Senator from California. In his own right, he is a great educator and a great realist who understands not only education, but human nature.

Long before I met him in this body, I read his works. I use his textbook "Language in Thought and Action," and my admiration is of the highest.

I would like to point out to the distinguished Senator from California, when he talks about referring this bill to the Human Resources Committee, that 11 members of the Human Resources Committee are cosponsors, including the chairman (Mr. Williams) and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Education (Mr. Pell).

When we were ready to report out this bill, we deferred the reporting out of the bill for 2 weeks. We referred the bill informally to the Human Resources Committee where it was examined. Yet they came back with recommendations, lost in the Department, they quit in frustration.

I want to point out, too, that the Governmental Affairs Committee has been engaged in a serious, thorough, and ongoing study of the issues since January 1977. We heard testimony from 100 witnesses in 10 days of hearings, and we have debated the bill for a long period of time. I think it is time for Congress to act.

All I know is that from more than 40 years in one way or another with government, the only way to kill something and get rid of it is to create another study. I would say the archives of this Government have gathered thick with dust with the various studies made, and nothing has ever happened until another study covered the same ground.

So I see nothing to be gained by another study, and I oppose this amendment.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I know our distinguished colleague from California is, himself, a preeminent expert in the field of education and has distinguished himself. But I think he would probably be the first to say that we can study things to death sometimes.

When I read carefully the statement of findings of the Congress as embodied in his amendment, I certainly concurred with many of those. But also when I looked to see what the study he proposes shall accomplish and do, it would seem to the Senator from Illinois a great many of those studies have already been take a look at the structure of the government for education to determine whether or not the structure assigns a high enough priority to education when it is buried so deep in a department that spends 95 percent or 94 percent of its resources in some other areas.

Three-tenths of our population is in some way involved in education—either as students, teachers, or administrators. Governmental expenditures for education at all levels will be more than $100 billion during this fiscal year.

In a Harris survey of last year, 89 percent of the public felt that "achieving quality education for children" was very important.

What has been the Federal response? Federal expenditures for education have actually declined, from approximately 12 percent in the late 1960's to a little more than 8 percent today. This has occurred at a time when school districts throughout the country are faced with severe financial difficulties. Many schoolchildren will miss valuable days in school simply because their school system is broke.

For some reason or other, we are not able to get adequate impact in school district after school district. Local referenda are turning down money for education. Education facilities are being contracted at a time when we should be strengthening them, if we assign high priority to them.

In addition, the Federal education effort is greatly fragmented, resulting in and we modified the bill to incorporate the recommendations of the Human Resources Committee.

I would also like to point out that the concept of a separate Department of Education has been around since the late 1860's. There may be more, but I know of 15 different studies over the last 60 years which touched on the issue in some detail. The last comprehensive study was by Rufus Miles, sponsored by the American Council on Education. This study recommended the creation of this department. In addition the Office of Management and Budget's reorganization project has been studying education reorganization for more than a year.

I would also like to point out that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee (Mr. MAGNUSON), who has had the responsibility for appropriations for HEW, which, of course, includes Education, is one of the most ardent, consistent, and passioned pleaders for this department, because he feels the time is long overdue.

I came out of the HEW secretaryship with the feeling this was a desperately needed creation, because it was lost in the Department of HEW. It is absolutely important that we create it.

I think the distinguished Senator from California can realize the low status that the Commissioner of Education now has when he considers that in the last 12 years there have been 13 Commissioners of Education. There has been complete frustration by these men of outstanding character and ability and national reputation as educators. When they saw that their position of commissionership was carried out ad infinitum and that we have now, finally, reached the stage where we are ready to bite the bullet and come down and reach a conclusion.

I think the Department of Education Act has been well thought through for many years, as my distinguished colleague, the manager of the bill (Mr. RIBICOFF), has said.

Certainly, education has always been one of my own highest priorities. I have been privileged to serve on the board of Cal. Tech. and the University of Chicago, now, for 30 years. I have worked intimately with primary and secondary education through the years and still consider it, as a U.S. Senator, one of the highest priorities on my own time that I should assign.

I think it should be one of the Nation's highest priorities, as well.

That has not always been the case, however. Presently, education has a relatively low status in the Federal Government.

It is a malnourished component of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, where only 6 percent of that Department's budget is devoted to education. In addition, the bulk of education programs in HEW are administered by a Commissioner of Education, and the Assistant Secretary of Education has few responsibilities and even less weight within HEW.

This is a question of national priorities. I think it is about time we really state that education must be one of our highest priorities. It is the duty and the responsibility of the Governmental Affairs Committeee of the U.S. Senate to an uncoordinated approach to solving the many problems facing our Nation's schools.

Just as we acknowledge that the strength of a nation rests with its people, we must also realize that its greatest natural resource is its children. We must do more to develop that precious resource. Raising education to a Cabinet-level position in our Government will symbolize our commitment to provide quality educations to all of our children. For that reason, I believe that the passage of S. 991 will be one of the most significant acts of this Congress, and urge its support by the full Senate.

It is extraordinarily difficult to know how a study will turn out. The Senator from Illinois really cannot [illegible] that we would not somehow have a [illegible] that would end up with the same conclusion, that what we really need in this country is a Department of Education. I think the time has come. The idea is here. This is the time to implement it.

For that reason—with deep regret and great respect—I oppose the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from California.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, with this amendment, I have a chance to sit back and listen to the colloquy, and a couple of additional thoughts come to mind.

One is that I cannot help listening to what the distinguished Senator from Illinois has just said, and I refer back to the colloquy that occurred previously among the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from Missouri, and the two distinguished floor managers of the bill.

I keep hearing two different signals. The first signal in the colloquy was that we were going to maintain State and local control. The second signal I heard was that we are going to increase Federal control and Federal funding and Federal priorities of education.

That is what has so disturbed me about this whole process: that in spite of the good intentions written into the purposes of this bill, unfortunately, the attitudes and the words and the statute itself are going entirely in the opposite direction.

I would only add to that an additional concern I have about this body, in my first session in Congress, and the distinguished Senator from Illinois has made the comment, also. We have access to the background and experience of the distinguished Senator from California. He is an educator par excellence in this country, in his field and related fields, and there is no one who anybody would put up against him. And what do we do? We reject his advice.

Time and time again in this body I have noted that when somebody has background and experience in a subject, that weighs for not one ounce in the deliberations of something that has been around for a long time.

That is what I am afraid, I say to the Senator, is the problem. The idea of a Department of Education has been around for a long time, and a few people Connecticut has said, this idea has been around for a long, long time. It has been discussed over and over again. It has not been acted upon for the precise reason that it is an idea whose time has not come and will not come for some time. It certainly has not come to the House.

The fact that the Commissioner of Education does not have a lot of power and authority does not mean that education has a low priority in this country. Education has enormous priority in every city, town, and village, most of whose taxes go to education.

It has enormous priority in every State budget which supports such enormous educational systems as the University of Texas system, the University of Wisconsin system, the two systems of the University of California. Education has enormous priority in this country, independently of the actions of the Federal Government.

I was told not long ago that the State of California was putting up one new community college a month, for the past couple of years. That may be an exaggeration, but it certainly is true that, all over California, we have seen community colleges proliferating.

Education has enormous priority in this country, and it is not dependent upon the commissioner of education in Washington nor upon a putative Secretary of Education in Washington.

What I am saying is that we should leave as much of it as possible in the hands of the regents of the various State university systems, in the private hands the course of my travels in the country as well as in the State of Illinois.

I again point out the shining example of how the Federal Government can grant money without strings and without controls in Federal revenue sharing. Let that be a shining example of how we collect money and then dispense it in such a way that we allow State and local government and the federal system of Government to use that money in a way which will best benefit the children for whom they have the direct responsibility.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I hasten to add that his record in this area is absolutely clear and commendable. I was merely listening to the words, and I would be the first to commend the distinguished Senator from Illinois on his efforts to move equality of opportunity into the educational system.

Equality of opportunity, I think the Senator will agree, does not always mean equality of funding. It means putting the funds in the places where equality can be bought, if you will. It is equality of opportunity by Federal funds.

I only add, though, that if primarily the Senator's intention is to have a department that distributes funds, then I think it is a mistake to make it a department. We can talk about that in connection with my next amendment having to do with agency.

However, unfortunately, that is apparently the primary focus of the creation of a Department of Education. It who were questioning that idea as an idea whose time has come cannot question it on the basis of our own background and experience in this field and say, "Hey, let's wait; let's pause and let's consider," as the Senator has proposed in his amendment.

Is this really the right study for this time in our history? Maybe it is. But, I, for one, am unconvinced. I think the Senator's amendment would give us that additional time to pause, to look at the issue objectively, if that is now possible, and I think it is, to look at the attitudes of our distinguished friends in the other body which are different from many of our own here. We can then decide whether this is really an idea whose time has come.

I think we will find that some polls now show that it certainly is not an idea whose time has come with the American people. I will discuss that shortly. The polls are not with the proponents of this bill. The polls are against them.

I certainly would take that into account in this election year, but it should be taken into account every election year, when it comes to creating a new departmental level bureaucracy.

I thank the distinguished Senator from California for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from New Mexico for his comments and his raising the question about whether or not this is an idea whose time has come.

As the distinguished Senator from of the Governors and regents of the distinguished private universities, such as Harvard or Yale or Stanford or Cal Tech.

There are many people who are taking responsibility and pouring money into this.

The idea that all this activity can be coordinated by a Federal Secretary of Education seems to me totally illusory, and that is why this idea has been around a long time without having been acted upon.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I would like to make one comment.

The distinguished Senator from California asked, "Why can't Johnny read?" All I can say is that if school districts required as part of their curriculum that every student read the works authored by the distinguished Senator from California, my feeling is that every Johnny and Susie in America could read.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I should like to comment on a statement made by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, in which he said a great deal has been said about increasing control and increasing the intervention of the Federal Government in the educational process in this country.

I want it a matter of record that at no time in the 30 or 40 years the Senator from Illinois has addressed himself to the problems of education has there been even the slightest hint of that. In fact, it has been totally to the contrary.

I do feel that we will have to increase our funding of education, and I have stated that flatly many times throughout appears to be dominated in fact in terms of sheer numbers by the takeover of the overseas schools now administered by the Department of Defense. It also has many other facets brought into it where projects and programs, Federal projects and programs, are being undertaken rather than the idea that we are going to take those steps necessary without interference with State and local programs to improve the quality of education.

I know that is the Senator's goal. I commend him for it and I hope that in other ways we can work together to see that that happens. I just find that I will have to disagree with him that this is the mechanism at this time.

I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, has the time been consumed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time remains on the amendment.

Does the Senator yield back his time?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment of the Senator from California and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

The question is on agreeing on the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from California.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND) are necessarily absent.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 70, nays 14, as follows:

be happy to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, I am about to propound a unanimous-consent request on the ERA extension.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, may I ask a question? This is not on my time. I do not know how rapidly this request is going to go. If it begins to impact on the 9:30 time agreement, I hope there will be no objection to the continuation of our discussion on the Department of Education bill and amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair observes there are 1½ hours on the Schmitt amendment; 2 hours on the amendment by Mr. HELMS; 1 hour on a motion by Mr. HAYAKAWA to recommit, 4½ hours of time, and final passage no later than 9:30.

Mr. SCHMITT. That was my purpose in bringing this up.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time utilized in discussing the proposed unanimous-consent agreement not come out of the Senator's time, and that the time for final vote be modified accordingly, which means that if we take 10 minutes in this discussion the final vote will occur no later than 9:40 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

So the motion to lay on the table UP amendment No. 1952 was agreed to.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD addressed the Chair.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I would

inally had thought would happen. I will also say that I do not believe I will call up my third amendment and, instead, will speak for a few minutes in general terms about the bill. We can move to final passage hopefully by 9:30, depending upon the response of any of the distinguished floor managers.

Mr. President, I guess it is fairly obvious by now that a few of us who have been involved in education as much as or maybe more than most have some very serious reservations about the action the Senate appears to be about to take if previous votes are any indication.

We have largely had our say. I just want to add to the final record a few of the comments of those who live outside these Chambers and offices.

I begin with the editorial comment of two of the major newspapers of this country, which, strangely enough, in recent years, I have found myself not agreeing with very much, but which illustrate the great diversity of ideologies that now seem to be joining together in opposition to this move toward a Department of Education.

The Washington Post, for example, wrote:

> The collection of various bureaucracies and instrumentalities into one seemingly logical place is a fairly common element of governmental-reform schemes—that has had at best mixed results. The bureaucratic bits and pieces that became HUD, for example, hardly underwent a galvanic revitalization by virtue of sharing a roof and a set of executive managers. And to look at either the Labor Department, say, or the Commerce Decreased to just nine departments in the first 160 years of our history. Yet, in the past 25 years, we have created four new departments with proposals pending for two more. Before long, the Cabinet will need to be superseded by another entity just to be manageable.

I draw my colleagues' historical attention to what the Romans learned empirically many, many centuries ago; that the No. 10 seems to have a very magic managerial connotation. That is that it is about the limit that human beings can deal with at any particular level. We are already at 12 Cabinet positions. We are seeking to create a 13th. As I said, there are proposals for even more.

The President, frankly, is saturated. All you have to do is look at the attention the President and the White House staff can give to certain other departments. They cannot give attention to departments nearly as much as we would like them to, depending on our own particular interests. This is not going to make the problem any easier. It is going to make it much worse. Rather than creating departments, we should be looking at how to break up some of the more unmanageable ones into independent agencies that can be responsible within certain bounds of the charter to the Congress. I hope that will become the trend once we have dealt with this particular problem of creating a Department of Education.

Mr. President, earlier today, I discussed the other organization of teach-

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement we will vote on final passage not later than 9:50.

The Senator from New Mexico has the floor under the agreement.

Mr. SCHMITT. In honor of this great feeling of cooperation and comity which has suddenly appeared in the Chamber of the Senate, I will do everything I can to get the vote off by 9:30 as we origpartment is to know that gathering units of government around a single large, controlling subject hardly guarantees their energy or efficiency.

We don't cite the Labor and Commerce departments casually: To the extent that they are basically one-constituency organizations of government, they provide another cautionary note. One of the principal risks of creating a separate education department is that it will become a creature of its clientele. That clientele would not necessarily be the schoolchildren and their parents affected by the federal government's education programs. Much more probably it would be the National Education Association, the organization of teachers and school administrators who already exert a great deal of influence on education policy in Washington. In a way, this would be giving them their own department.

The New York Times, in its editorial of January 16, 1978, wrote as follows:

> We welcomed the creation of the Department of Energy last year; it meant not fragmentation but centralization of functions scattered around the Government and dealing with an issue of overriding importance. There is no such sudden, overriding importance to justify creating a Department of Education. To do so would keep a campaign promise; it would tickle the education world's sense of importance; it could, at best, make present education programs more orderly and efficient. But it is hard to see, beyond that, what such a reorganization would do to benefit actual education.

Mr. President, I also add that just the problem of having an additional Cabinet-level person seeking the attention of the White House and the very concept of a cabinet has been eroded with the proliferation of executive departments. The original Cabinet of five departments in-ers and administrators who are opposed to this bill. The NEA has often been cited as being in favor of it. Well, the American Federation of Teachers of the AFL-CIO is very undisposed toward this kind of legislation. I quote again:

> S. 991 will not result in increased coordination of Federal education efforts. What is likely is that a new Federal education department would magnify the Federal role in education policy decisions that have previously been viewed as state and local matters. Federal departments are designed to deal with policy and administration. There is, of course, a Federal system of justice for the Department of Justice to administer. The obvious need for national control over Defense and Foreign policy speaks for itself. Education, however, has traditionally been a state and local responsibility supplemented by an important but clearly limited Federal role. The Federal responsibility in education has been primarily to promote equal educational opportunity for historically neglected and unserved populations, such as educationally disadvantaged and handicapped youngsters, and to provide poor- and middle-income families with the financial aid necessary to pursue post-secondary education.
> Implicit in the creation of a Federal department is a new Federal role that exceeds these previous limitations.

Mr. President, I again emphasize and underline everything the AFT has said. Of course, the inclusion of the overseas school system as a major system of 135,000 pupils in the Department of Education exceeds these previous limitations on the Federal role. The inclusion of other educational activities of mission agencies in this Department again exceeds these previous limitations on the Federal role.

I think the AFT is particularly well qualified to discuss this matter, because, as the statement of Gregory Humphrey, codirector of legislation of that organization has said before the House Subcommittee on Legislation and National Security:

> The AFT represents more college professor members than any other organization in this country. we are deeply concerned with their point of view and they tend to be even more skeptical of this proposal than other AFT members. Twenty-five percent of higher education funds come from the federal level while only 9% of elementary and secondary education funds are federal. Research funds for institutions of higher education come from practically every department in the federal government. Their administration probably never could, or should be consolidated. We do not believe that post-secondary education would benefit from a federal department that encompasses an education division, of HEW and little else.

I add only in slight correction to that statement the fact that it includes much more than HEW. That is the education system now run by the Department of Defense, which, in fact, will constitute more than a majority of employees of the new department in its initial phases.

Mr. President, we have tended to forget those people out there in this debate who have to deal with the Federal bureaucracy. I should like to bring one such individual onto this floor by proxy, a Mr. Walter E. Smith, of the Los Alamos, N. Mex., School System, who, on his own, independently, having had a great deal of experience in that system, did a study bill—it costs something on the order of $2.2 million.

Illinois, the cost was almost $7.9 million.

Missouri, $3.4 million.

Oklahoma, $2.0 million.

New Mexico came in under $1 million, just barely, though; $968,000.

So the cost now, just with the activities within HEW, is running in those kinds of figures.

Again, I do not see right now that I can assure Mr. Smith that is going to change. In fact, I can only probably assure him it will probably get worse with the new Department.

But what about the people as a whole? We are getting close to the final vote on this, how are the people now looking at us—some of us, at least, as a condition for reelection—going to perceive this particular vote this evening?

Well, the question was asked by Mr. Gallup in his polls recently, published in September, 1977:

> In your opinion, should education be taken out of the present Department of HEW and made a separate dpartment of the Federal Government, or not?

Mr. President, the national totals were as follows: Those who favor making education a separate department, 40 percent; those opopsed, 45 percent. The don't knows and no answers were 15 percent.

If we look at a breakdown of that in terms of those who have children in schools, it was 40 to 42 opposed. Those parents have some control over their election. I am afraid my constituents are asking what control they will have over the Department of Education, another large group of unelected bureaucrats.

The feeling is in this Senator's mind, and I believe in the minds of many others, that national standards will come, that national tests will fall, national curriculum will soon fall behind.

The Federal control and the concept of big brother in education is very rapidly coming upon us.

As I said earlier when I first began this discussion, it is diversity in education and local control of that diversity that has made this Nation's educational system second to none. It should be our attempt to improve and increase the ability of our educational systems to tap diversity, rather than taking any step such as this one toward the homogenization of the educational system of this great country.

Mr. President, I appreciate the indulgence of the managers of this bill. I think we have had a good discussion. I think the record will be useful for whatever purposes our friends in the other body may put it.

I do hope they will protect us from ourselves on this issue, at least for this year, and maybe next year, with due consideration, some other means can be found to better coordinate, better control, the educational activities that are presently somewhat out of control in the Federal Government.

The distinguished Senator from Con-which he entitled "Federal Regulations and Paperwork: What Is the Cost to Local Educational Agencies?"

I quote now from his introduction to that study:

> Educators welcomed federal aid to education because it permitted program expansion and improvement. However, greater direct federal involvement in education has created additional work for educators at all levels. Local educators are questioning the value of the funds received because of the problems created by regulatory demands.
> More and more regulations have been imposed upon school districts for project preparation and evaluation, which has resulted in increasing demands on educators' time. The amount of required paperwork is astounding, and becoming greater each year. An example of burdensome federal regulatory demands is evident in the redundancy of project applications. The school district must prepare and submit demographic information for each and every federal project. Educators must comply with these regulations—there are no alternatives. Complaints of these redundant procedures seem to fall on deaf ears.

Mr. President, somehow, I am supposed to assure Mr. Smith that joining all of this together in one big super bureaucracy is somehow going to improve or eliminate the problem they are faced with.

I would just quote to my colleagues here on the floor Mr. Smith's compilation of the cost of complying with Federal regulations by State at the present time, and based on a weighted sample cost per student of $3.46. This would be the figures, I believe, for 1977.

Connecticut—the distinguished Senator from Connecticut is managing this public school parents, 40 to 49 opposed. Those parochial school parents, 42 to 47 opposed.

So, however we look at it, the people now appear to be close, but still significantly opposed to this particular effort.

Finally, Mr. President, all the evidence that I am familiar with, after many years in the educational systems and many years as an observer and researcher on educational problems outside the context of the committees of the Congress, indicates to me that the Federal presence in education should be reduced and not increased .

There is no question that the efficiency of education, that is, the time a good teacher has to spend with a child, is going down, largely because of the Federal presence in education, there is no question in this Senator's mind, after working with the educators and teachers of New Mexico.

In addition, it is claimed in the report on this measure that there will be no new regulatory impact because of this bill. If there will not be, why do we need 50 new supergrade positions attached to this agency?

I am afraid, Mr. President, every parent will regret our actions if they lose more and more controls over the lives of their children to the Federal Government.

We are, in fact, bucking the general trend that I think all of us are beginning to feel very strongly against big, impersonal Government.

Our casework that we perform for our constituents is almost entirely dealing with the impersonality of Government.

Local school boards are elected and necticut, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, are to be complimented for their sincere efforts in putting together a bill of this kind. I am very sorry that I cannot agree with them that this is the right approach. I would much rather agree with my colleagues than disagree. But, nevertheless, they have put in a great many years on this effort and that effort must be recognized for its sincerity.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not been called up.

Mr. SCHMITT. I request the yeas and nays on final passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, the Schmitt amendment strikes at the very heart of this legislation.

The 62 Senators who have cosponsored this bill recognize that education is an important, fundamental function in the United States. It directly involves more than one-quarter of our population every day.

Cabinet status means improved accountability—something we rarely get from the education officials buried in the bureaucracy of HEW.

Cabinet status drastically improves the access of our highest ranking education official to the President. It actually encourages and demands Presidential involvement. When the President wants to get involved in education at the Federal level, who can he go to? The HEW Secretary will be too busy administering the other $170 billion in his large department. The education officials four levels below have virtually no policy responsibility.

Education in the Federal Government has the size, scope, and character to deserve Cabinet status. This new Department, which will not gain any new programatic authority under this bill, will rank in size larger than six existing Cabinet departments.

Cabinet status attracts the most capable and qualified leadership. I consider the U.S. Office of Education an "independent agency" within HEW. But that agency has a hard time holding onto its leaders. The Commissionership of Education, for example, has changed hands 13 different times in the last 12 years.

In our hearings on this bill, most State education officials told the committee they could not afford to take the top Federal education post. It is a terribly frustrating job. Giving education continued independent agency status would do little to improve this situation.

Cabinet status means improved coordination of Federal education programs. It has been said that the greatest coordinating body of all is the Cabinet. This bill consolidates more than 170 education programs in one department. Another 100 will stay outside, mainly because they are integrally related to the mission of their parent agency. Co-

But in the case of education, there is a sore need for a Cabinet department.

Basically, the whole point of this legislation is to elevate the status and improve the management of education in the Federal Government. The Schmitt amendment would have the effect of maintaining the status quo.

As floor manager of the bill, I strongly oppose the Schmitt amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Leon Billings and Jim Case of Senator MUSKIE's staff, Al From and Jim Davidson of the Governmental Affairs staff, and Karl Braithwaite and Robert Van Heuvelen of the Environment and Public Works Committee staff be accorded privileges of the floor during consideration of and votes on S. 991, the Department of Education bill, S. 3077, the Export-Import Bank bill, and House Joint Resolution 638, the equal rights amendment extension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. After the colloquy, I will yield 7 minutes to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Connecticut.

I am concerned, as others are, about transferring responsibility for vocational rehabilitation at the Federal level to the new Department. I support the creation of the new Department. I am concerned about the effect the transfer

Mr. BELLMON. I thank the distinguished floor manager.

I should like to propound an additional question:

Do the managers agree with me that the Senate's decision to move vocational rehabilitation into the new Federal Department of Education reflects no judgement at all about the proper locus of responsibility for that program at the State level, and that, to the contrary, it would be advisable to accept the judgements of Governors and State legislatures about organizational arrangements for the program?

Mr. RIBICOFF. Once again, the Senator from Oklahoma is correct. The transfer of vocational rehabilitation programs to the Department of Education was made by the committee because it believed such a move would consolidate Federal programs directed toward the education of the handicapped and would provide a continuum of rehabilitative services for the handicapped children and adults at the Federal level. This transfer makes no judgment at all about the locus of responsibility for these programs at the State level. I certainly agree it is advisable to accept the judgments of Governors and State legislatures about organizational arrangements for these programs at the State level.

Mr. BELLMON. I thank the floor manager of the bill. I am greatly reassured by his response.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

ordinating all these programs will be a difficult job which only a strong, high-level Cabinet Secretary can do.

If education is relegated to independent agency status, I fear the chances are great we will never hear or see our top education officials again. They would be ignored and forgotten by higher-ranking Cabinet Secretaries and the President.

Making education an independent agency would only serve to isolate education even more from all the other agencies and departments having related human services functions, when what we really should be doing is developing more linkages.

Cabinet Secretaries can relate to one another because they are on an equal footing with one another, and they all share in the high honor and duty of being a member of the President's Cabinet. These good working relationships simply would not exist between Cabinet Secretaries and the head of an independent education agency.

The Governmental Affairs Committee, which is charged with creating and abolishing agencies, has studied this bill thoroughly. The committee unanimously recommended the creation of a Cabinet post, because the institutional deficiencies can only be remedied through Cabinet status.

We could have recommended Cabinet status for the consumer protection agency, or a Cabinet Department of Administration in place of GSA—but Cabinet status was clearly not warranted in those instances.

may have upon the administration of vocational rehabilitation at the State level.

I believe that it is critically important that we interfere as little as possible in decisions such as State government organization. There are dramatic differences among States, constitutionally and in terms of organizational necessities. I want to be certain that we are not treading on this dangerous ground. To this end, I would like to ask the distinguished floor managers two questions: first, am I correct in my understanding that Senator CHILES' amendment specifically precludes the Federal Department of Education from attempting to influence State decisions as to where the vocational rehabilitation program will be administered?

Mr. RIBICOFF. The distinguished Senator from Oklahoma is absolutely correct. The committee believed that because the focus of many of the programs at training, and training is directly related to education, these programs would best be joined with those administered by the Buerau of Education for the Handicapped in the Department of Education at the Federal level. However, the committee intentionally did not suggest where these types of programs would best operate at the State level. In fact, Senator CHILES' amendment, adopted unanimously by the committee, specifically states that nothing in the section establishing the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services shall require any particular organizational structure of vocational rehabilitation programs at the State level.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I have always been a supporter of a strong and effective educational system in this country. With the insight provided as a former school teacher, high school coach, and county superintendent of education, I can attest that the education of our children is one of the most important goals of a continuing free society. As a State senator and as Governor, I initiated and supported many laws advancing education in our State, such as the area trade schools, which were the foundation of our present technical school system, the best in the Nation.

Over the years, as a citizen, I have illustrated my deep concern for education by using my honorariums, and other funds which I obtained, to establish 27 scholarships in 23 educational institutions in South Carolina for the benefit of needy, worthy students. Also, I established the Strom Thurmond Foundation to aid needy, worthy students to attend college or technical schools, and it is now assisting between 40 and 60 young people a year to further their education and training.

Therefore, Mr. President, as I rise today in support of S. 991, which establishes a separate Department of Education, I speak not as a politician in Washington aloft from the real needs of education in this country, but as one who has been there and who is aware of the needs and importance of education.

Yesterday, this body passed the Labor/HEW appropriations measure, the second largest appropriations bill to come before the Congress. The budget of HEW will rise to about $180 billion this year, which is more than one-third of the entire Federal budget. In such a large department, it is understandable that one segment could be the victim of neglect.

An examination of the hearings on this bill illustrates time and time again that the primary interest of HEW has been with health and welfare programs and not with education. In the $180 billion budget I mentioned earlier, at least $168 billion will be expended for health and welfare. Mr. President, that leaves only $12 billion, or a mere 6 percent of the total HEW budget for education. This is not, of course, to cast a bad light on health and welfare programs because they are very important parts of the Department; but the point is that education needs to be placed in a separate department not dominated by these other programs.

There are other concerns which mandate a separate department of education. The $25 billion that this Government will spend on education this year will come from more than 300 separate programs operated by nearly 40 different Federal agencies. Under this system, each agency promulgates its own rules and regulation and its own paperwork requirements.

The overlap and duplication that inevitably occurs due to these administrative burdens are a tremendous hindrance to the educators over this country in performing their duties. This legislation will stop this fragmentation confident they will do as I will do and vote favorably on this bill.

In closing, Mr. President, I compliment the able and distinguished Senator from Connecticut and the able and distinguished Senator from Illinois for the excellent job they have done on this bill.

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I would like to clarify a matter with the distinguished chairman of the committee about this bill regarding the applicability of the Eagleton-Biden anti-busing amendment to the expenditure of funds by the new Department of Education. Mr. President, the fiscal 1979 Labor-HEW appropriations bill, H.R. 12929, as passed by both the House and the Senate, contains language identical to that contained in previous HEW appropriations bills. This language prohibits HEW from using any funds to require, directly or indirectly, the transportation of any student to a school other than the school which is nearest the student's home, in order to comply with title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Section 501(a) of the Department of Education bill we are considering today provides for the transfer of unexpended funds for education functions to the new Department as follows:

> Unexpended funds transferred pursuant to this subsection shall be used only for the purposes for which the funds were originally authorized and appropriated.

It is my understanding from this language in S. 991 under section 501(a) that the Eagleton-Biden amendment as enquires that any appropriated funds transferred to the new Department shall be subject to the identical restrictions and requirements they were subject to when originally authorized and appropriated. As far as the Eagleton-Biden language is concerned, this means the new Department of Education would be prohibited from expending any funds transferred to it from the HEW appropriations bill so as to require busing of schoolchildren under title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. We would expect that no funds which have been appropriated under different measures for any functions transferred to the new Department could be used to circumvent the intent of the language of the Eagleton-Biden amendment.●

● Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of S. 991, I am pleased that the Senate is considering this legislation to create a U.S. Department of Education. After years of discussion, the concept of a separate Department of Education has finally received the serious consideration and widespread endorsement it deserves, and its consideration by the Senate today indicates the high priority of our educational needs.

The Committee on Governmental Affairs has conducted extensive hearings on S. 991, which demonstrated the broad support for this proposal. During the course of these hearings, excellent arguments in support of such a Cabinet-level agency were made by many experienced educators and administrators.

and duplication and join all of these functions under one roof where they can be administered more efficiently and effectively.

Mr. President, with the creation of this new Department, we will have a responsible, high-level Federal official whose only concern will be education. This person will be held accountable not only when there are advances in education, but also when there are failures. Education will have an advocate in Washington for its needs and to work hard toward solving its problems. When the Congress or the public desires to inquire into the status of education in this country, there will be one central office, a Cabinet-level Department, from which the information can be obtained.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to emphasize my understanding that this bill, with all of its benefits through centralization and effective management, will not mean more control. I am bitterly opposed to Federal control of education. By this, I mean that the policy decisions and curriculum to be taught in local schools will remain at the State and local level where it belongs. A new Department of Education can do an important job by assisting the States and localities without infringing on their rights to establish their individual educational needs.

Mr. President, today we have a great opportunity to advance the role of education in our country more significantly than ever before. The establishment of this new Department will be a sign of our unabating commitment to education. I urge my colleagues to examine the need for this legislation closely, and then I am acted as part of the fiscal 1979 Labor-HEW appropriations bill prohibits the new Department of Education from using any unexpected funds transferred to the Department to require, directly, or indirectly, the transportation of any student to a school other than the school which is nearest the student's home, in order to comply with title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Furthermore, because the language in section 501(a) stipulates that unexpended funds which are transferred to the new Department may be used only for the purposes for which they were originally authorized and appropriated, I am given to understand that functions which are transferred to the new Department that have been funded through other different appropriations measures may not be used to circumvent the intent of the language of the Eagleton-Biden amendment by using the moneys contained in these measures to require, directly, or indirectly, the transportation of any student to a school other than the school which is nearest the student's home, in order to comply with title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut if I am correct in my understanding of this matter.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I would answer the Senator from Delaware's question on the application of the Eagleton-Biden antibusing amendment as enacted, to the use of appropriated funds by the Department of Education, as follows: Yes, it is clearly the intention of this legislation and the intention of the committee in drafting the bill that section 501(a) of this legislation clearly re-

While there have been varied opinions as to the structure of the new Department, I am confident these differences will be resolved during this debate, and that we will move closer toward our goal of assuring effective and equal educational opportunities for all Americans. The needs of education have greatly increased during this century, and today it is one of our most important public investments. More than 50 million people in the United States are directly involved with education today. When HEW was first established in 1953, the budget of the Office of Education was $400 million, and today it has a budget of $12.8 billion.

S. 991 is designed to consolidate and coordinate the education programs which are currently scattered throughout the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) and other departments. The Secretary of HEW must deal with such vital public issues as social security, welfare reform, and health care in addition to education, and cannot always give the necessary attention to the demands of contemporary education because of the complexity of these other responsibilities.

In addition to the vast educational network at HEW, there are over 100 educational programs scattered and fragmented throughout more than 40 other Federal agencies. This legislation would provide an effective framework for managing these programs and for reducing the present waste and duplication that ultimately lowers the quality of education.

A major goal in establishing a separate Department of Education is to provide a cohesive structure which will simplify the administrative procedures for recipients of Federal education funds. I have heard countless complaints from State and local school officials in Iowa about the confusing mandates being passed down to school systems and about administrators going from agency to agency for program support. S. 991 is designed to eliminate these unnecessary problems and provide for improved cooperation between Federal, State, and local education agencies. Our educational services would be more efficient.

This legislation would strengthen the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to assure coordination of Federal programs affecting education, and would establish an Office of Inspector General to supervise auditing and investigative activities in the Department. In addition, it establishes an Intergovernmental Advisory Council to assist the Secretary in the formulation of education policy and to review the administration and operation of Federal education programs.

Mr. President, by giving Cabinet-level status to education, we are not only providing an uninterrupted focus for establishing a coherent Federal policy but we are also expressing a national commitment to meeting the educational needs of all Americans. Many Iowans have expressed their strong support of this vital legislation to me, and I am confident it will greatly enhance the quality of education in the United States. I commend Senator RIBICOFF and the other members of the Senate Governmental Affairs

The able floor manager of this bill, Mr. RIBICOFF, has already described the provisions of this measure, and I do not intend to repeat the details of this reorganization. I would, however, like to make some comments as to why I feel strongly that we need a Cabinet-level Department of Education.

I believe that the Federal involvement in education, with its primary goal of equalizing opportunities for all citizens, is a commendable one. These programs have made a great difference in the education of many socially, physically, and economically handicapped children.

But the price for these benefits has often been confusion, fragmentation, duplication, delay, and general frustration with the paperwork and painstaking slowness of Federal bureaucratic processes.

Federal regulations require days, even weeks, of administrative time, often at great expense to school systems. But the mandates do not stop at the administrative levels. Teachers also must spend hours of their time in complying with Federal requirements and completing nebulous and often inane forms when time and effort could be better expended in fulfulling the educational needs of the students.

And all of this time and effort is expended at a price. Only 8 percent of the cost of public education is assumed by the Federal Government.

There is a reason for the burdensome paperwork, for the regulations and for the guidelines. It may not be a good

> The Commissioner is an executive level 5 in the government structure, and in HEW that is one of the lowest forms of human life.

He also stated that during his 2 years' service as Commissioner of Education, he had the opportunity to meet directly with President Nixon on only one occasion and that was when he was appointed.

This is just one sad example of the frustration of being U.S. Commissioner of Education, and is perhaps one reason why this job changes hands so much. The Commissioner of Education has almost no opportunity for policy input. His decisions and recommendations on education budgets are usually overruled. He is buried within the HEW bureaucracy with very little access to the Secretary of HEW, much less anyone higher.

All the aforementioned problems describe a generally deplorable situation, yet, such is the state of education at the Federal level. It is incumbent on us now to take steps to remedy this problem.

I believe that the first step we must take is to establish a Cabinet-level Department of Education. I am not going to pretend that I believe that a separate Department of Education will solve all our educational problems or guarantee that the quality of these endeavors will be improved. But I do strongly believe that an identifiable, Cabinet-level department which consolidates existing programs, streamlines administration

Committee for their dedicated efforts to bring this bill to the floor of the Senate this year, and I urge my colleagues to approve S. 991.●

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 991, the legislation to create an independent Department of Education in the executive branch of the Government.

As an original sponsor of S. 991, I feel that the establishment of a separate Department of Education is a needed and sensible step in our efforts to improve the administration and oversight of all educational programs and policies for the Federal Government. S. 991 is not the first legislation which has been introduced in Congress to create such a Department.

Senator RIBICOFF, the primary sponsor of this bill and the able chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, introduced such a measure in the 89th Congress. But I believe that the need for such a Department has become more apparent in the last 10 years when the role of the Federal Government in education has expanded. Today, we bring this bill to the Senate floor with over 50 bipartisan cosponsors who share the view that our Government has no national educational policy and no coordinated system of providing educational services to the State and local educational agencies, our colleges and universities, and most importantly, our Nation's youth. It is our hope that a separate Department of Education will help alleviate this problem and bring some guidance to our fragmented educational programs.

reason, but it is a simple one. The paperwork, the regulations and the guidelines fill the vacuum created by the unconscionable absence of a Federal education policy.

This is not the fault of the executive branch alone. In a very real sense, Congress must share the blame, because Capitol Hill is responsible for the extraordinary fragmentation in education programs that is now so severe that only a reorganization of Government can respond to the problem.

For example, in addition to the education division of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, 37 other departments and agencies run 130 education programs of their own. We have also played musical chairs with our Commissioners of Education—there have been 13 individuals holding this position in the past 13 years. With continuity of leadership like that, there is little wonder that bureaucrats write regulations, guidelines and prepare new forms to their hearts content.

And, although the Secretary of HEW is ultimately responsible, it is difficult for even the most competent and concerned HEW Secretary to be a real spokesman for education when the massive health and welfare needs, with their concurrent extraordinary expenditures, demand all his time and energies.

But not only is the Commissioner of Education's responsibilities fragmented his voice and opinion have little authority and receive little attention. In hearings on the Department of Education which I chaired in the Governmental Affairs Committee, former Commissioner of Education Terrel Bell, testified:

and establishes direct lines of authority can go a long way toward the improvement of education.

But even more importantly, Congress and the American people need a visible, responsible, high-level Federal official who can be held accountable for the successes or failures of educational programs and policies at the Federal level. Education also needs a strong advocate in the executive branch to delineate its priorities and to assist in solving its problems. A Department of Education can go a long way toward meeting these needs.

But I feel I must take a moment to emphasize that the effective management which will accompany a Department of Education should not mean more control. The Committee on Governmental Affairs, with my strong concurrence, has stated emphatically in its report on the Department of Education bill that the responsibility for education policy and curriculum will remain at the State, local and private levels. However, a Secretary of Education can mean improved accountability, coordination and advocacy, all of which are important if the Federal Government is going to make its involvement in education meaningful.

As I previously stated, the Department of Education is by no means a new idea, but during the 95th Congress, it has come to life. The Governmental Affairs Committee held 10 days of hearings on this measure and heard from more than 100 witnesses. The committee has also received excellent cooperation from the administration in the development of a workable reorganization proposal.

I would like to commend Senator RIBICOFF for his excellent leadership in introducing and encouraging the passage of this measure. I would also like to thank Miss Marilyn Harris and Mr. Bob Heffernon of the Governmental Affairs Committee staff for their dedication, cooperation, and diligence in formulating a measure which will best serve the needs of education in our Nation.

Education is an investment of no small measure in our Nation. In 1977, the American people spent $140 billion on education—this is 8 percent of our gross national product and more than we spend on national defense. Today, nearly 3 out of every 10 Americans—63.7 million citizens—are directly involved in education. And, education is by far the largest expenditure of State and local governments, accounting for more than one-third of their budgets.

The bill which we are considering today reflects the goals and concerns of citizens throughout our Nation who are interested in improving education opportunities and wisely spending our educational dollars. I believe that the result of the long months of work on S. 991 is an excellent measure which will reorganize our Federal educational effort, reduce fragmentation, give priority attention to these urgent needs and provide more responsive educational services to the youth of our Nation.

Mr. President, I urge that the Senate adopt this important legislation.●

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I support S. 991, a bill which would create a new Department of Education. Today, in these times of higher costs for education and lower productivity, education in America is facing great difficulty. Teachers are often overburdened, students apathetic, and parents often apathetic. The results of standardized achievement tests show a steady decline in test scores. In reaction to this phenomenon, any number of theories have been formulated to explain where education has gone wrong. Over and over again, the suggestion is made that a separate Department of Education would help the situation. If this were to be done, education would receive a new visibility and an enlarged realm of influence which should help bolster education programs.

FEDERAL SPENDING

Federal spending has increased many times over from the days the Office of Education was created within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in 1953, and when it operated on a $400 million budget. Under President Johnson and his initiatives in social legislation, Federal spending for education increased 10 times over, reaching $4 billion. Now, Federal spending in this area is about $10 billion annually. Given this tremendous surge in Federal spending, it is clear that the Congress perceives education as a legitimate national concern, and one which merits Cabinet level attention.

Mr. President, I do not think it is overstating the situation to say that the future of our country rests on our educational system. Every day, millions and millions of children—the Presidents, Senators, professors, journalists, and engineers of the future—sit in classrooms across America and absorb or fail to absorb intellectual concepts and ideas. I cabinet level Department of Education. The impetus behind a separate Department of Education has been growing for approximately 125 years. Nourished with this record of longevity, the idea of a new Department of Education has grown more attractive in recent years as we have watched the proliferation of education programs become entangled in the bureaucracy of the Department of Health, Educaton, and Welfare.

Much work has gone into this bill, and I appreciate the efforts of my colleagues as they have worked to insure that just those programs which are most pertinent to education are included in the new Department. I especially want to thank the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) for his efforts to delete the nutrition programs from being included in the Department.

Several Members were quite concerned that if this component was in fact transferred to the proposed Department as the original bill mandated, nutrition programs would no longer have the heavy emphasis placed on them which they are now beginning to receive within the Department of Agriculture. I just want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to Senator PERCY and his staff for all of their efforts on the amendment to delete nutrition programs from the list of services being transferred.

PROBLEMS IN EDUCATION

Most parents and educators have serious concerns about the state of education in the United States today. Few persons, if any, are satisfied with their public school system. Students are often disruptive, teachers often unmotivated, believe it is our responsibility to see that these young citizens receive the best education we can provide, and I feel that a new Department of Education is one way toward that goal.

CONCLUSION

When I look at the many studies which have been done on the question of whether or not a separate Department of Education is in our Nation's best interest, I am impressed with the near unanimity with which researchers have answered "yes." This topic has been debated throughout this century, and I am hopeful that by a favorable vote on S. 991, we are taking a sizeable step toward improving the educational structure in our government.

I share with the sponsors of this bill a feeling of anxiety over the future of our educational process, and am pleased to join with them in this effort to come to grips with the programmatic shortcomings found in the Office of Education.●

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I join my colleague and the distinguished chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, Senator RIBICOFF, in support of S. 991, the Department of Education Act of 1978, and I strongly urge its passage by the Senate.

As one of the original cosponsors of the bill, I am committed to the idea of giving education the high status and visibility it rightly deserves in the Federal Government.

Education in the United States is the key to higher living standards for millions of people. We must work therefore to provide equal education and training opportunities for all Americans. At present tirely solve the problem, it is the necessary first step in the right direction.

I am pleased that President Carter has given his full support to the creation of the Department of Education. It is my strong hope that, in the spirit of cooperation and compromise, we can complete action on this legislation before the end of the 95th Congress.●

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as a cosponsor, I am pleased to rise in support of S. 991, legislation which would create a new Department of Education. I want to commend my colleagues for the imagination and exhaustive effort that has gone into this landmark legislation, particularly the distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator RIBICOFF.

S. 991 marks a new and exciting day for education in the United States. I believe it will help to usher in an era of improved coordination and cooperation in education programs across the country.

One need only look at the declining test scores in our schools and the multitude of education programs to realize that a change in this area is necessary. As an ardent advocate of high educational goals, I wholeheartedly embrace the concept of a separate Department of Education.

It is essential that the Federal Government be organized in such a way as to maximize the educational opportunity for everyone. While I generally oppose expansion of the Federal bureaucracy, I am more concerned with the effect of unorganized, uncoordinated and inefficient Federal education programs. That is the system that exists today. Our present education system consists of hundreds of Federal programs which are now located in more than 40 different agencies. This bill will bring the vast majority of these programs into a central and cohesive working organization at the Cabinet level.

While differences may exist as to which programs ought to be included under the umbrella of the new Department of Education, the need for a separate Cabinet-level Department is unquestionable.

Education like charity begins at home. For this reason I feel that the decisions concerning education should remain as close to home as possible—that is in the hands of local school boards. I have no desire to see the Federal Government assume a central or controlling role in our educational structure. Rather I believe that we must maintain a decentralized approach to education.

At the same time I realize that many Federal programs are not being effectively utilized because of a failure on the part of the Federal structure to coordinate its role in the educational system. It is my sincere hope that this Department will allow the Federal Government to become an effective and efficient partner in the educational process.

Mr. President, S. 991 has had a broad base of support since it was first introduced in this Congress. Members on both sides of the aisle have joined as cosponsors of this legislation. Educators and educational organizations have joined in enthusiastic support of this measure.

ships and reinforce old ones that will enhance the role of the States and local communities in educating our Nation's children.

As our society has developed, the economic aspects of education have undergone a radical transformation. By the mid-1980's the United States will be spending more than $150 billion annually on education—the primary activity of more than 63 million Americans. With a population of over 200 million people, nearly 3 out of every 10 persons are directly involved in the schooling of our citizens. If any area requires national attention and Cabinet-level status in our Government, it is education.

Education is the most valuable instrument at our Nation's disposal to enrich individual lives, offer economic opportunity and to enhance social justice. And the contemporary educational system goes far beyond our formal schools, colleges, and universities. Ancillary educational resources at our disposal are both diverse and substantial. We cannot ignore the important role of other institutions such as families and churches, libraries and museums, radio and television networks, journals, books and newspapers, the workplace, cultural and arts institutions and community organizations. In order to reflect more accurately the reality of education in today's America where learning and teaching are lifelong activities, we must recognize the need for broad and innovative approaches and opportunities for learning experiences outside the traditional

I am especially pleased with S. 991's creation of the Office of Occupational, Adult and Community Education. This Office will provide for the effective administration of Federal vocational, adult and community education assistance to State and local programs. A broad-based Department of Education will bring into sharper focus the wide range of Federal educational programs.

A Department of Education must also have a strong science education component. My colleagues well know the current decline in the quality of science and mathematics education in our schools. The program being transferred will provide the Department with an opportunity to grapple with this problem especially in the areas of teacher training, student orientation to science, institutional support, science education research and development, and public understanding of science programs. These programs fit well into the scope of the new Department and can enhance the Department's Office of Educational Research and Improvement.

We in the United States are concerned with the lives of our youth and the future of our Nation. It is our obligation to correct the persistent problems that prevent students from achieving their potential and from obtaining the best possible preparation for life that our country can offer. A Department of Education can provide the kind of leadership and coordination necessary to approach these goals. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

In my own State, the Tennessee Education Association feels that this legislation is the most important education measure we have considered in many years. I share that view and am proud to cast my vote in favor of the establishment of a new and necessary Department of Education.

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to support this legislation to create a separate Department of Education. As chairman of the Human Resources Committee, I wish to commend the Governmental Affairs Committee for their efforts in working with us on this legislation.

The education of our children and students is vital to the future of the United States. Since the beginning of the Republic, our Nation's leaders have recognized the importance of education for the sustenance of a free democratic society. We can be justly proud of the accomplishments of our educational system. It has provided opportunities for economic advancement for generations of citizens and provided the skills and knowledge required to make the United States competitive in business and commerce with the rest of the world.

Early in the history of this country the tradition of State and local control over our schools was established. This tradition must be perserved, and the Federal commitment to education strengthened. We can assist in accomplishing this goal by establishing a Cabinet-level Deparement of Education. It is time for us to create new partner- classroom and educational institution. Similarly, the responsibility for our students does not stop at the classroom, but extends to all of the services provided by our schools.

One responsibility of a Cabinet officer is to bring a departmental perspective to solving our Nation's problems. For example, during the national gas shortage 2 years ago, the Secretaries of Treasury and Commerce stepped forward to minimize the negative effects on business that gas allocations would cause. However, there was no one to consider the effect on the public schools, hence a number of schools were unnecessarily closed during the energy crisis, temporarily bringing classes to a halt. Paradoxically, more energy was consumed by students at home than they would have experienced in schools with moderately lowered temperatures.

Further, changes in the way the Unemployment Trust Fund treats State and local governments could seriously affect the ability of schools to provide services. Yet when such changes are proposed, no Cabinet officer has the interests or the undivided time to represent the interests of education.

Education, as an enterprise, is experiencing a period of enormous revision. Competition for resources has increased, severe inequities in financing education still exist, while demands for increased excellence and quality must be addressed. The establishment of a Department of Education will provide a better administrative mechanism through which the Federal Government can tackle these national problems.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT TO STRIKE DOMENICI UP AMENDMENT NO. 1841 FROM THE BILL

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, in conformance with the Stevens amendment, which was adopted a few moments ago, I ask unanimous consent that Senator DOMENICI's unprinted amendment No. 1841, with respect to Indian education, be stricken in its entirety from S. 991.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATSUNAGA). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SCHMITT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I think it is very near the time to vote. I certainly hope we have a reasonable turnout for that vote.

I shall finally add two points to the record before the vote.

One is that we are dealing with a constitutional issue, and I think that will be discussed further in the next Congress, assuming that our colleagues in the House of Representatives do their duty.

Second, the taxpayer is going to find an additional burden imposed upon him.

The estimate is now that the additional cost of this department in fiscal year 1979 will be $3.3 million; fiscal year 1980, $5.7 million; fiscal year 1981, $8.3 million; fiscal year 1982, $10.441 million; and fiscal year 1983, $11.1 million.

I think Senators can see where that trend is going to. It is going to have a significant economic impact and have a significant regulatory impact.

I urge my colleagues to consider twice and vote against final passage.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I think that we have before us no committee amendment.

Mr. SCHMITT. I think there is some confusion on that.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SCHMITT. The Senator from New Mexico did not offer his third amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

The vote was on the committee amendment, as amended, in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Senator from New Mexico did not offer his amendment?

Mr. SCHMITT. I did not offer my third amendment. I am sorry. I guess the Senator from Connecticut missed that point.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

ator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

On this vote, the Senator from Utah (Mr. GARN) is paired with the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER). If present and voting, the Senator from Utah would vote "yea" and the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 11, as follows:

So the bill (S. 991) was passed.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MELCHER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of S. 991.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I would like to especially thank Senator PERCY and all the Senators and their staffs on the Governmental Affairs Committee. I want to especially thank Senator MURIEL HUMPHREY for her support. Senator Hubert Humphrey had been such an ardent supporter of this legislation for so many years. I want to also thank those on the Human Resources Committee, and the other Senators of this body and their outstanding staff who have worked so hard to make this legislation possible. Their dedication and hard work has brought this department into reality.

Franklyn Zweig (Senator Williams).

Jean Frohlicher (Senator Pell), Patria Forsythe (Senator Randolph).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, with the passage of S. 991, the Department of Education Organization Act of 1978, the Senate has taken what can legitimately be regarded as a giant step forward toward the goal of upgrading and improving this country's educational system.

For too long now our schools and educational programs have been the poor stepchildren of a huge Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. With a budget only one-eighteenth that provided for health and welfare programs, it was almost inevitable that the Department's Education Division would "get lost in the shuffle" and that our educational programs would not receive the attention or be given the priority that they deserve. This is precisely what has happened.

At the same time, with a current budget of over $10.5 billion, the Education Division itself is easily large enough to constitute a separate department. This budget already exceeds that of the Departments of the Interior, Commerce, Justice, and State.

S. 991, which the Senate has passed today, will serve to correct this situation and further evidence this Nation's commitment to provide the people of this country with the best possible education. For the first time our Government will have a Cabinet-level Department of Education devoted solely to the needs of the educational system.

I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF) and the distinguished Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) on their signal accomplishment. This was a bill that was supposed not to pass, that it would not pass, but due to the fine and splendid cooperation of everyone on both sides of the aisle the bill has now been enacted.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I want to pay special tribute to the majority and minority leaders. During the closing days of the session, I know how difficult it is to program legislation, and it is only because of the cooperation of the majority and minority leaders and their commitment to this bill that it was possible to bring this bill up and get the Senate to take action. My feeling is that because the Senate has acted so overwhelmingly, we can now expect positive action in the House, and then the signature of the President of the United States.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would like to join the majority leader in extending my congratulations and thanks to the distinguished manager of the bill, the able and distinguished Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF), and the distinguished manager of the bill on behalf of the minority, the senior Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), my classmate. They have worked diligently and hard to bring us to this point.

I have had the privilege of conferring with both of them on the question of scheduling this matter. It appeared, as the majority leader indicated earlier, for a while that it could not be scheduled. But by their perseverence and persistent effort and cooperation, it has now been scheduled and disposed of in the Senate.

I want to pay special tribute to Marilyn Harris of the Governmental Affairs staff who worked so tirelessly and constructively throughout the entire conception up to final passage of this bill.

I also want to pay tribute to Richard Wegman and Jonathan Greenblatt who worked diligently to see this bill to completion tonight, and special tribute to Robert Hefferman, who devoted tireless energy and provided valuable assistance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the following staff members who worked so diligently on the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Lawrence Grisham, John Childers (Senator Percy).

Brian Conboy, Alan Bennett, Greg Fusco (Senator Javits).

Nancy Anderson, Link Hoewing (Senator Roth).

Jill Porter (Senator Mathias).

Mary Anne Simpson, Carl Flair (Senator Stevens).

Martina Pearson (Senator Heinz).

Chris Brewster and Harrison Fox (a former member of Senator Danforth's staff) (Senator Danforth).

Carnie Hayes (Senator Chiles).

Terry Jolly (Senator Muskie).

Cheryl Davis (Senator Nunn).

Reg Gilliam (Senator Glenn), and Evelyn Jacobs (a former member of Senator Glenn's staff).

Marcia McCord (Senator Eagleton).

Howard Orenstein and Dru Smith (Senator Sasser).

Charlotte Tsoucalas (Senator Jackson).

Tom Cator (Senator Humphrey).

Letitia Chambers (Senator Domenici).

The creation of the new Department of Education will insure that education receives appropriate emphasis at the Federal level and help to end the piecemeal approach to education-related problems that presently exists. It will also serve to continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to insuring access to equal education opportunities.

Mr. President, the passage of this legislation by the Senate today is directly attributable to the tremendous effort on its behalf by the distinguished chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, who has so skillfully managed the bill, Senator RIBICOFF. Senator RIBICOFF's longstanding interest in and concern with the entire field of education and ways in which it can be improved are well-known to every Member of this body. His expertise in this area is exceeded by no one and goes back well beyond his service as Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare in the Cabinet of President Kennedy. Thanks to his hard work, diligence, and skill, what has been the goal of so many for so long will hopefully become a reality in the near future. He is deserving of a great debt of gratitude.

Credit must also be given, of course, to the distinguished Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) for the role that he has played in bringing this bill to passage today. His skill and cooperation, which go beyond this particular legislation, have made a great contribution to what we have achieved today.

Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF) and the distin- I think this is a milestone piece of legislation, and I commend them for their efforts; and I thank the majority leader for his cooperation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I want to include in my expressions of gratitude a special measure of thanks to the distinguished minority leader and those on the minority side for their cooperation in arranging for a time agreement on this matter, which enabled it to be considered and concluded.

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) education is fundamental to the growth and achievement of the Nation;

(2) there is a continual need to provide equal access by all Americans, especially the disadvantaged and handicapped, to high quality educational opportunities;

(3) the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with State, local, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities, and families;

(4) the dispersion of education programs across a large number of Federal agencies has led to fragmented, duplicative, and often inconsistent Federal policies relating to education;

(5) there is ineffective management of existing Federal resources for State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions;

(6) there is substantial evidence that the quality of education and the development of basic skills are not keeping pace with current demands;

(7) the current structure of the executive branch of the Government fails to recognize the importance of education and does not allow for sufficient Presidential and public consideration of issues relating to education;

(8) the importance of education is increasing as new technologies and alternative approaches to traditional education are considered, as society becomes more complex, and as equal opportunities in education and employment are promoted; and

(9) therefore, it is in the public interest and general welfare of the United States to establish a Department of Education.

PURPOSES

SEC. 102. (a) It is the purpose of this Act to establish a Department of Education in order to—

(1) insure that education receives the appropriate emphasis at the Federal level;

(2) enable the Federal Government to coordinate education activities and programs more effectively through interagency cooperation, technical assistance, and evaluation of program effectiveness;

(3) continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities;

(4) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents, and students to improve the quality of education, while acknowledging the right of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions to formulate policies, choose curricula, decide administrative questions, and choose program content with respect to their educational programs;

(5) encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the decisionmaking process relating to education, including the development and improvement of education programs and services;

(6) promote the quality and relevance of education to individual needs, including the assurance of an adequate level of skill development and lifelong learning opportunities;

(7) broaden approaches to meeting educational and developmental needs by strengthening relationships among schools, parents, students, communities, the workplace, and other related institutions;

(8) (A) provide assistance in the support of research relating to human development and learning systems that complement education, with a greater emphasis on the practical application of such research; (B) collect and analyze information on the progress and condition of education in the United States; and (C) work with State, local, and tribal officials, public and nonpublic educational institutions, community organizations, parents, and students to implement the findings of such research at the local level;

(9) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, tribal, and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated educational needs of such agencies, especially with respect to the simplification of the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, as well as the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens and constraints, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds; and

(10) assess the potential contribution of educational institutions, including institutions of higher education, to the improvement of education by creating mechanisms

by which such institutions may bring problems to the attention of appropriate departments and agencies and may make recommendations to foster the continuing vitality of such institutions.

(b) It is the intention of the Congress in the creation of the Department of Education to protect the rights of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, and selection of curricula and program content, and to strengthen and improve the direction of such governments and institutions over their educational programs and policies.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 103. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "Department" means the Department of Education or any component thereof;

(2) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education;

(3) the term "Under Secretary" means the Under Secretary of Education;

(4) the term "Assistant Secretary" means an Assistant Secretary of Education;

(5) the term "Director" means the Director of the Office for Civil Rights;

(6) the term "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children;

(7) the term "Council" means the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education;

(9) the term "function" includes any duty, obligation, power, authority, responsibility, right, privilege, and activity.

TITLE II—ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

SEC. 201. There is established as an executive department of the Government, the Department of Education.

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS

SEC. 202. (a) The Department shall be administered by a Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level I of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5312 of title 5, United States Code.

(b) (1) There shall be in the Department an Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Under Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level III of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5314, United States Code.

(2) The Secretary shall designate the order in which other officials of the Department shall act for and perform the functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of both the Secretary and Under Secretary or in the event of vacancies in both of those offices.

(c) (1) There shall be in the Department—

(A) an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services;

(B) an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education;

(C) an Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education;

(D) an Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education;

(E) an Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement;

(F) a Director of the Office for Civil Rights;

(G) two additional Assistant Secretaries;

(H) an Inspector General; and

(I) a General Counsel.

(2) Each of the Assistant Secretaries, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the Inspector General, and the General Counsel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the Inspector General, and the General Counsel shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the Inspector General, and the General Counsel shall report directly to the Secretary and shall be compensated at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

(d) One of the Assistant Secretaries appointed pursuant to subsection (c) (1) (I) shall administer the functions of the Department under section 203 (11) and shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe. One of the Assistant Secretaries appointed pursuant to subsection (c) (1) (I) shall administer the functions of the Department under section 203 (13) and shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

(e) There shall be in the Department an Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependent Children. The Administrator shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. The Administrator shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

(f) There shall be in the Department one additional officer who shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. Such officer shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

(g) Whenever the President submits the name of an individual to the Senate for confirmation as an officer of the Department under subsection (c), (d), and (f), the President shall state the particular functions of the Department such individual will exercise upon taking office.

FUNCTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 203. The functions of the Department shall be to promote the cause and advancement of education throughout the United States and shall include—

(1) administration of programs pertaining to elementary and secondary education, including programs under part B of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964;

(a) There is established in the Department an Office of Educational Research and Improvement, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Research and Improvement appointed under section 202 (c). The Secretary shall delegate to the Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement—

(1) all functions transferred from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare—

(A) under section 301 (b) (2) (A) (i), relating to the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education;

(B) under section 301 (b) (2) (F), relating to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations; and

(2) all programs transferred from the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation under section 303.

(b) The Assistant Secretary for Research and Improvement shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE OF INSPECTOR GENERAL

SEC. 211. (a) There is established in the Department an Office of Inspector General, to be administered by the Inspector General appointed under section 202 (c).

(b) The Inspector General shall carry out the functions of the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to education transferred to the Secretary under section 301 (b) (2) (D), and shall perform such functions with respect to all functions of the Secretary or of the Department, or of any officer or component thereof. The Inspector General of the Department shall be appointed and removed in the same manner, and shall have the same status, as the Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(c) The Inspector General shall be subject to the provisions of subchapter III of chapter 73, title 5, United States Code, notwithstanding any exemption from such provision which might otherwise apply.

OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL

SEC. 212. There is established in the Department an Office of General Counsel, to be administered by the General Counsel appointed under section 202(c). The General Counsel shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe, and shall provide legal assistance to the Secretary concerning the programs and policies of the Department.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

SEC. 213. (a) There is established within the Department an advisory committee to be known as the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council shall provide assistance and make recommendations to the Secretary and the President concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education.

(b) (1) In carrying out its functions under subsection (a), the Council shall—

(A) provide a forum for the development of intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education;

(B) make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs and education-related programs;

(C) promote better intergovernmental relations;

(D) assess Federal policies and make recommendations to insure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions;

(E) submit a report biannually to the Congress, to the President, and to the Secretary which—

(i) reviews the impact of Federal education policies upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions; and

(ii) assesses the achievement of Federal objectives in education as well as any adverse consequences of Federal actions upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions; and

(F) assist the Secretary in conducting conferences and similar activities to assess the contribution of each level of government to the delivery of equitable, high-quality, and effective education.

(2) In carrying out its function under subsection (a), the Council may review rules or regulations proposed by the Department concerning Federal education programs prior to the promulgation of such rules or regulations in order to determine the impact of such rules or regulations on State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

(c) (1) The Council shall be composed of twenty-two members, to be appointed by the President—

(A) six members from among representatives of elected State, local, and tribal officials;

(B) six members from among representatives of the public, including parents, students, and public interest groups;

(C) five members from among representatives of public and nonpublic preschool, elementary, and secondary educational institutions, including school board members, administrators, and teachers; and

(D) five members from among representatives of public and nonpublic postsecondary educational institutions, including board members, administrators, and teachers.

(2) In making appointments under this subsection, the President shall consult with various organizations representative of the groups specified in subparagraphs (A) through (D) of paragraph (1), including the National Governors' Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, and the United States Conference of Mayors.

(3) Not more than eleven of the members of the Council may be members of the same political party.

(d) (1) Members of the Council shall be appointed for a term of four years, except that the term of office of the members first appointed shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, five at the end of one year, five at the end of two years, six at the end of three years, and six at the end of four years.

(2) Any member of the Council who is appointed pursuant to subsection (c) (1) may serve on the Council beyond the period that such member holds the elective office which served as the basis of the appointment of such member.

(e) The President shall designate one of the members of the Council as the Chair of the Council.

(f) Twelve members of the Council shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may hold hearings. Any vacancy in the Council shall not affect its power to function.

(g) (1) In carrying out the provisions of subsection (b) (2), the Council shall establish a subcommittee to review proposed rules or regulations concerning Federal education programs in order to determine the impact of such rules or regulations on State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions. In reviewing such rules or regulations, the Council may provide parties to be affected by such rules or regulations an opportunity to comment on such rules or regulations, and shall consider any comments received in reviewing such rules or regulations.

(2) The Council may submit a report containing the results of its review of any such rules or regulations to the Secretary. Any such report shall be submitted by the Council within the time established for public comment on such rules or regulations. The Secretary shall place any report received from the Council on the record of the proceedings concerning such rules or regulations, and shall make such report public. Within thirty days of the receipt of such report, the Secretary shall submit a written public response on the record which addresses the recommendations made by the Council concerning any rule or regulation reviewed, and contains a statement of the reasons why the Secretary will or will not incorporate the recommendations made by the Council in such rule or regulation.

(h) Each member of the Council who is not otherwise employed by the United States Government shall receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily rate prescribed for GS–18 under the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime, for each day such member is engaged in the actual performance of duties as a member of the Council. A member of the Council who is an officer or employee of the United States Government shall serve without additional compensation. All members of the Council shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties.

(i) In order to carry out the provisions of this section, the Council is authorized to—

(1) hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, either as a whole or by subcommittee, and request the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as the Council or such subcommittee may deem advisable; and

(2) request the cooperation and assistance of Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities in carrying out the provisions of this section, and such departments, agencies, and instrumentalities are authorized to provide such cooperation and assistance.

(j) The Secretary shall appoint an executive director for the Council. Such executive director shall be compensated at the rate provided for GS–17 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332, title 5, United States Code. The Secretary shall provide the Council with such other staff, support, facilities, and assistance as may be necessary to enable the Council to carry out its duties under this section.

FEDERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

SEC. 214. (a) There is established a Federal Interagency Committee on Education. The Committee shall assist the Secretary in providing a mechanism to assure that the procedures and actions of the Department and other Federal departments and agencies are fully coordinated.

(b) The Committee shall cooperate with the Secretary in the conduct of studies and shall make recommendations in order to assure the effective coordination of Federal programs affecting education, including—

(1) the consistent administration of policies and practices by Federal agencies in the conduct of similar programs;

(2) full and effective communication among Federal agencies to avoid unnecessary duplication of activities;

(3) adequate procedures to assure the availability of information requested by the Secretary;

(4) the improvement, development, and oversight of a comprehensive Federal policy for education; and

(5) the improvement of the administration and coordination of federally funded vocational education and training programs for the purpose of aiding students and adults in preparing for and achieving success in their work life.

(c) (1) The Committee shall be composed of at least seventeen members. One member shall be the Secretary, who shall be the Chair of the Committee.

(2) (A) Sixteen members of the Committee shall be representatives of the departments and agencies listed in subparagraph (B), to be appointed by the head of each department and agency from among the senior officials of that department or agency who are responsible for the formulation of policy in that department or agency.

(B) The departments and agencies to be represented on the Committee pursuant to subparagraph (A) are—

(i) Department of Agriculture;

(ii) Department of Commerce;

(iii) Department of Defense;

(iv) Department of Energy;

(v) Department of Justice;

(vi) Department of Health and Human Services;

(vii) Department of the Interior;

(viii) Department of Labor;

(ix) Department of State;

(x) National Aeronautics and Space Administration;

(xi) National Endowment for the Arts;

(xii) National Endowment for the Humanities;

(xiii) National Science Foundation;

(xiv) Veterans' Administration;

(xv) Commission on Civil Rights; and

(xvi) Environmental Protection Agency.

(3) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, and the Executive Director of the Domestic Policy Staff may each designate a member of the staff of such agencies to attend meetings of the Committee as observers.

(4) The Secretary may invite the heads of Federal agencies other than the agencies represented on the Committee under the provisions of paragraph (2) to designate representatives to serve as members of the Committee or to participate in meetings of the Committee concerning matters of substantial interest to such agencies.

(d) In carrying out its functions under subsection (b) (5), the Committee shall conduct a study concerning the need for improved coordination between all federally funded vocational education and training programs. The Committee shall report the findings of such study to the Secretary and the Congress within two years of the date of enactment of this Act.

(e) The Committee shall meet at least twice each year.

(f) The Secretary and the head of each Federal agency represented on the Committee under subsection (c) (2) shall furnish such assistance, support, facilities, and staff to the Committee as may be necessary to enable the Committee to carry out its functions under this section.

TITLE III—TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS

TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

SEC. 301. (a) All officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, grants, property, and records as are determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any function of the following agencies, offices, or parts of agencies or offices, are hereby transferred to the Department and vested in the Secretary:

(xiv) under the Career Education Incentive Act.

(B) with respect to the administration of part B of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964;

(C) with respect to or being administered by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare through the Office for Civil Rights for the enforcement of the provisions of the civil rights laws and educational orders relating to the functions transferred by other subsections of this section and the other sections of this title;

(D) with respect to the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to the functions transferred by this section;

(E) with respect to all laws dealing with the relationship between (i) Gallaudet College (including the Model Secondary School for the Deaf), Howard University, the American Printing House for the Blind, and the National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and (ii) the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(F) under subpart A of part IV of title III of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations;

(G) under subparts II and III of part B of title VIII of the Public Health Service Act, relating to the establishment of student loan funds and scholarship grant programs for schools of nursing and under subparts I and II of part C of title VII of such Act, relating to the establishment of student loan insurance and student loan funds for schools of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, pharmacy, podiatry, optometry, or veterinary medicine; and

(H) (i) with respect to and being administered by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare through the Commissioner of Rehabilitation Services under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, except that the provisions of this subdivision shall not be construed to transfer to the Secretary the functions of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under sections 222 and 1615 of the Social Security Act, relating to rehabilitation services for disabled individuals and rehabilitation services for blind and disabled individuals respectively;

(ii) under section 405(a)(5) and section 405(c) of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973; and

(iii) with respect to or being administered by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare through the Commissioner of Rehabilitation Services under the Act entitled "An Act to authorize the operation of stands in Federal buildings by blind persons, to enlarge the economic opportunities of the blind, and for other purposes", approved June 20, 1936 (commonly referred to as the Randolph-Sheppard Act) (20 U.S.C. 107-107f).

(3) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the National Institute of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(4) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Institute of Museum Services of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(5) Nothing in the provisions of this section or in the provisions of this Act shall authorize the transfer of functions under part A of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, relating to Project Head Start, from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to the Secretary.

TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

SEC. 302. (a) (1) There are transferred to the Department all officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, and records as are determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any function of the office of Dependents Schools of the Department of Defense.

(2) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Secretary of Defense relating to the operation of overseas schools for dependent children of personnel of the Department of Defense.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to operate a program for the education for overseas dependent children of personnel of the Department of Defense and for education of dependent children of personnel of the Department employed in such program.

(c) In addition to authorities available to the Secretary under this or any other Act, the authorities available to the Secretary of Defense and the Secretaries of the military departments under the Defense Department Overseas Teachers Pay and Personnel Practices Act shall be available to the Secretary with respect to the program transferred under subsection (a).

(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 601, the transfer of functions under subsection (a) shall be effective at such time or times and in such manner as the President shall prescribe, but in no case later than three years after the effective date of this Act. Not later than one year after the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall transmit to the Congress a plan for effecting the transfers of functions under subsection (a). Such plan shall contain recommendations for increasing the participation of parents, teachers, students, school administrators, and members of the Armed Forces in the administration and operation of the schools transferred under this section.

TRANSFERS OF FUNCTIONS FROM THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

SEC. 303. (a) There are transferred to the Secretary all programs relating to science education of the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation under section 3 (a) (1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950 established on the day before the effective date of this Act, except the functions and programs, as determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, which relate to (1) fellowships and traineeships integral to the support of scientific research and development, (2) ethical, value, and science policy issues, or (3) communicating science information to nonscientists.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to conduct the programs transferred by subsection (a). In conducting such programs the Secretary shall consult, as appropriate, with the Director of the National Science Foundation.

(c) Nothing in this section is intended to repeal or limit the authority of the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation to initiate and conduct programs not established prior to the effective date of this Act under section 3 (a) (1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950.

TRANSFERS OF PROGRAMS FROM DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

SEC. 304. There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Attorney General and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration relating to the student loan and grant programs known as the law enforcement and education program and the law enforcement intern program authorized under section 406 (b), (c), and (f) of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968.

TRANSFERS OF FUNCTIONS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 305. There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development under title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 relating to college housing loans.

TRANSFER OF THE ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION STATISTICS

SEC. 306. (a) There are transferred to the Department all officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, and records as are determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any function of the Advisory Council on Education Statistics.

(b) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Advisory Council on Education Statistics.

EFFECT OF TRANSFERS

Sec. 307. The transfer of a function from an officer or agency to the Secretary shall include the transfer of any aspect of such function or program vested in a subordinate of such officer or in a component of such agency.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

Part A—Personnel Provisions

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

Sec. 401. (a) The Secretary is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, including attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Secretary and the Department. Except as otherwise provided by law, such officers and employees shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and compensated in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title.

(b) (1) Subject to the provisions of chapter 51 of title 5, United States Code, but notwithstanding the last two sentences of section 5108 (a) of such title, the Secretary may place in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18 all positions in such grades assigned and employed on August 1, 1978, in connection with functions transferred under this Act, subject to the limitation of the first sentence of section 5108 (a) of such title.

(2) Appointments under this subsection may be made without regard to the provisions of section 3324 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the approval by the Civil Service Commission of appointments in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18, if the individual placed in such position is transferred to the Department in connection with a transfer of functions under this Act and, immediately before the effective date of this Act, held a position involving duties comparable to those of such position.

(3) The authority of the Secretary under this subsection to appoint personnel without regard to sections 3324 and 5108 (a) of title 5, United States Code, shall cease with respect to any position when the person first appointed to fill such position no longer holds such position.

(c) (1) In addition to the number of positions which may be placed at the GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18 levels under section 5108 of title 5, United States Code, under existing law, or under this Act, the Secretary may appoint—

(A) for the Office of Educational Research and Improvement, professional and technical employees, in a number not to exceed one-third of the total number of employees of such office; and

(B) not more than fifteen transitional employees;

without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and may fix the compensation of such personnel without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter 53 of such title, except the Secretary may not compensate any such personnel in excess of the maximum rate prescribed for GS-18 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) The authority of the Secretary to appoint and compensate personnel under paragraph (1)(B) shall expire three years after the effective date of this Act.

(d)(1) There are authorized for the Department seventy-one additional positions in the competitive service at levels GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18. Such positions shall be for the exclusive use of the Department and shall be in addition to the number of such positions placed in the appropriate grades under section 5108 of title 5, United States Code, or under other provisions of law.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to assign twenty-one of the positions authorized under this subsection to replace, at their former General Schedule levels, the twenty-one positions previously established by law in the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, except that the Secretary may from time to time evaluate the propriety of the General Schedule level of each such position and make any necessary reductions in such grade level.

(3) For purposes of determining the maximum aggregate number of positions which may be placed at grade levels GS-16, GS-17, or GS-18 under section 5108(a) of title 5, United States Code, of the positions established under this subsection, other than those used to replace positions previously established by law in the Education Division, 63 percent shall be deemed GS-16 positions, 25 percent shall be deemed GS-17 positions, and 12 percent shall be deemed GS-18 positions.

(e) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the application of any Indian preference law in effect on the day before the date of enactment of this Act to any function transferred by this Act and subject to any such law on the day before the date of enactment of this Act. Any function transferred by this Act and subject to any such law shall continue to be subject to any such law.

(f)(1) The Secretary is authorized to accept voluntary and uncompensated services without regard to the provisions of section 3679(b) of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 665(b)) provided that such services will not be used to displace Federal employees employed on a full-time, part-time, or seasonal basis.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to provide for incidental expenses, including but not limited to transportation, lodging, and subsistence for such volunteers.

(3) An individual who provides voluntary services under subsection (a) of this section shall not be considered a Federal employee for any purpose other than for purposes of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, relating to compensation for work injuries, and of chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code, relating to tort claims.

EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS

SEC. 402. The Secretary may obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, and may compensate such experts and consultants at rates not to exceed the daily rate prescribed for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title.

ANNUAL AUTHORIZATION OF PERSONNEL

SEC. 403. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this—

(1) Congress shall authorize the end strength as of the end of each fiscal year for personnel for the Department. Except as provided in subsection (b) (1) for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, Congress shall authorize the end strength for any fiscal year by prescribing the maximum number of personnel that may be employed by the Department on the last day of such fiscal year. No funds may be appropriated for any fiscal year to or for the use of personnel of the Department unless the end strength for personnel of the Department for that fiscal year has been authorized by law.

(2) The end strength for personnel authorized by law for the Department for any fiscal year shall be apportioned among the offices and agencies of the Department in such numbers as the Secretary shall prescribe. Except as provided in subsection (b) (2), the Secretary shall, within one hundred and twenty days after the enactment of legislation authorizing the end strength for personnel of the Department for any fiscal year, prepare and transmit to the Congress a report showing the allocation of such personnel among the offices and agencies of the Department. Such report shall include explanations and justifications for the allocations of personnel made by the Secretary among the offices and agencies of the Department.

(3) In computing the authorized end strength for personnel of the Department for any fiscal year, there shall be included all direct-hire and indirect-hire personnel employed to perform functions of the Department whether employed on a full-time, part-time, or intermittent basis, but excluding special employment categories for students and disadvantaged youth, including temporary summer employment.

(4) Whenever any function, power, duty, or activity is transferred or assigned in any fiscal year after the effective date of this Act to the Department from a department or agency outside of the Department, the end strength for personnel authorized for the Department for such fiscal year shall be adjusted to reflect any increases or decreases in personnel required as a result of such transfer or assignment.

(b) (1) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Department is authorized an end strength for personnel equal to the sum of (A) the number of personnel to be employed by the Department under the authorizations provided by other sections of this Act, and (B) the number of personnel transferred, under authority of this Act, to the Department from other departments and agencies of the Government during such fiscal year, as determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget. If the Secretary determines such action is necessary for the effective administration of the Department, he may employ additional personnel during such fiscal year in excess of the number authorized under the preceding sentence, but the number of such additional personnel may not exceed 1 per centum of the number authorized under the preceding sentence.

(2) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Secretary shall prepare and transmit the report required by subsection (a) (2) within one hundred and twenty days after the effective date of this Act.

PART B—GENERAL PROVISIONS

AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 411. In the exercise of the functions transferred under this Act, the Secretary shall have the same authority as the functions of the agency or office, or any part thereof, exercising such functions immediately preceding their transfer, and the actions of the Secretary in exercising such functions shall have the same force and effect as when exercised by such agency or office, or part thereof.

DELEGATION

SEC. 412. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the Secretary may delegate any of his functions to such officers and employees of the Department as the Secretary may designate, and may authorize such successive redelegations of such functions within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate. No delegation of functions by the Secretary under this section or under any other provision of this Act shall relieve the Secretary of responsibility for the administration of such functions.

REORGANIZATION

SEC. 413. (a) Subject to the provisions of section 202(g) of this Act and subsections (b) and (c) of this section, the Secretary is authorized to allocate or reallocate functions among the officers of the Department, and to establish, consolidate, alter, or discontinue such organizational entities within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate. The authority of the Secretary under this subsection does not extend to—

(1) any office, bureau, unit, or other entity within the Department established by statute or any function vested by statute in such an entity or officer of such an entity;

(2) the abolition of organizational entities established by this Act; or

(3) the alteration of the delegation of functions under this Act to any specific organizational entity.

(b) (1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Secretary may not consolidate, alter, or discontinue any of the following statutory entities, or reallocate any functions vested by statute in the following statutory entities:

(A) Office of Bilingual Education;

(B) Teacher Corps;

(C) Community College Unit;

(D) National Center for Education Statistics;

(E) National Institute of Education;

(F) Office of Environmental Education;

(G) Office of Consumers' Education;

(H) Office of Libraries and Learning Resources;

(I) Office of Indian Education;

(J) Institute of Museum Services; and

(K) Administrative units for guidance and counseling programs, the veterans' cost of instruction program, and the program for the gifted and talented children.

(2) The Secretary may not alter, consolidate, or discontinue any organizational entity continued within the Department and described in paragraph (1) of this subsection or reallocate any function vested by statute in such an entity, unless a period of ninety days has passed after the receipt by the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsection and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of such proposed action.

(c) The Secretary may not alter, consolidate, or discontinue the Office of Career Education, or reallocate the functions vested in such Office by the Career Education

Incentive Act, section 406 of the Education Amendments of 1974, or any other statute prior to October 1, 1983, unless (A) funds are not appropriated to carry out the provisions of such Act for any fiscal year preceding such date and (B) a period of ninety days has passed after the receipt by the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsection and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of the proposed action. After October 1, 1983, such Office shall not be altered, consolidated or discontinued, or its functions reallocated unless a period of ninety days has passed after the receipt by the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsection and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of the proposed action.

(d) On the effective date of this Act, the following entities shall lapse:

(1) The Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the Office of Education;

(2) The Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(3) The Bureau for the education and training for the handicapped of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; and

(4) The Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

REPORTING RELATIONSHIPS

SEC. 414. (a) Consistent with the provisions of section 413, and notwithstanding the provisions of the General Education Provisions Act or of any other Act, any Officer or employee of the Department whose functions were transferred by this Act and who was required prior to the effective date of this Act to report to the Commissioner of Education or the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare shall report to the Secretary.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to delegate the reporting requirements established by subsection (a) to any other officer or employee of the Department.

RULES

SEC. 415. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe, in accordance with the provisions of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code, such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the functions of the Secretary or the Department.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 416. (a) The Secretary is authorized to enter into and perform such contracts, grants, leases, cooperative agreements, or other similar transactions with Federal departments and agencies, public agencies, State, local, and tribal governments, private organizations, and individuals, and to make such payments, by way of advance or reimbursement, as the Secretary may deem necessary or appropriate to carry out the functions of the Secretary in administering the Department.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no authority to enter into contracts or to make payments under this title shall be effective except to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance under appropriation Acts. This subsection shall not apply with respect to the authority granted under section 423.

TECHNICAL ADVICE

SEC. 417. The Secretary is authorized to provide advice, counsel, and technical assistance to applicants, potential applicants, and other interested persons with respect to any program or function of the Secretary or the Department. The Secretary shall, upon request, provide technical assistance to any State desiring to develop comprehensive plans applicable to two or more programs administered by the Department.

REGIONAL AND FIELD OFFICES

SEC. 418. The Secretary is authorized to establish, maintain, alter, or discontinue such regional or other field offices as may be necessary or appropriate to perform the functions of the Secretary or the Department.

ACQUISITION AND MAINTENANCE OF PROPERTY

SEC. 419. (a) The Secretary is authorized to—

(1) acquire (by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise), construct, improve, repair, operate, and maintain schools and related facilities, laboratories, research and testing sites and facilities, quarters and related accommodations for employees and dependents of employees of the Department, personal property (including patents), or any interest therein, as may be necessary; and

(2) provide by contract or otherwise for the establishment of eating facilities and other necessary facilities for the health and welfare of employees of the Department at its installations, and purchase and maintain equipment therefor.

(b) The authority available to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under section 524 of the Education Amendments of 1976 shall also be available to the Secretary.

(c) The authority granted by subsection (a) shall be available only with respect to facilities of a special purpose nature that cannot readily be reassigned for similar Federal activities and are not otherwise available for assignment to the Department by the Administrator of General Services.

FACILITIES AT REMOTE LOCATIONS

SEC. 420. (a) The Secretary is authorized to provide, construct, or maintain for employees and their dependents stationed at remote locations as necessary and when not otherwise available at such remote locations—

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) dining facilities;

(4) audiovisual equipment, accessories, and supplies for recreation and training;

(5) reimbursement for food, clothing, medicine, and other supplies furnished by such employees in emergencies for the temporary relief of distressed persons;

(6) living and working quarters and facilities; and

(7) transportation for dependents of employees of the Department to the nearest appropriate educational facilities.

(b) The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of the cost of such work or services or to refund excess sums when necessary.

USE OF FACILITIES

SEC. 421. (a) (1) To carry out the functions of the Secretary, the Secretary may use the research, equipment, services, and facilities of any agency or instrumentality of the United States or of any State, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any Indian tribe or tribal organization, or of any foreign government, with the consent of and with or without reimbursement to such agency, instrumentality, State, political subdivision, Indian tribe or tribal organization, or foreign government.

(2) Notwithstanding the transfer of functions from the Department of Defense to the Department under section 304, all personnel performing such functions shall be treated, for the purpose of access to services and facilities provided by the Department of Defense, as employees of the Department of Defense.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to permit public and private agencies, corporations, associations, Indian tribes or tribal organizations, other organizations, or individuals to use any real property, or any facilities, structures, or other improvement thereon, under the custody and control of the Secretary for Department purposes. The Secretary shall permit the use of such property, facilities, structures, or improvements under such terms and rates and for such periods as may be in the public interest, except that the periods of such uses may not exceed five years. The Secretary may require permittees under this section to recondition and maintain, at their own expense, the real property, facilities, structures, and improvements used by such permittees to a standard satisfactory to the Secretary. This subsection shall not apply to excess property as defined in section 3(e) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 472(e)).

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of such cost of the equipment or facilities provided or to refund excess sums when necessary.

COPYRIGHTS AND PATENTS

SEC. 422. The Secretary is authorized to acquire any of the following described rights if the property acquired thereby is for use by or for, or useful to, the Department:

(1) copyrights, patents, and applications for patents, designs, processes, and manufacturing data;

(2) licenses under copyrights, patents, and applications for patents; and

(3) releases, before suit is brought, for past infringement of patents or copyrights.

GIFTS AND BEQUESTS

SEC. 423. The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts, bequests, and devises of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts, bequests, and devises of money and proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts, bequests, or devises shall be deposited in the Treasury in a separate fund and shall be disbursed upon the order of the Secretary. Property accepted pursuant to this section, and the proceeds thereof, shall be used as nearly as possible in accordance with the terms of the gift, bequest, or devise donating such property. For the purposes of Federal income, estate, and gift taxes, property accepted under this section shall be considered as a gift, bequest, or devise to the United States.

WORKING CAPITAL FUND

SEC. 424. The Secretary is authorized to establish a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interests of economy and efficiency, including such services as a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its components; central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services; office space, central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and a central library service. The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing capital (which appropriations are hereby authorized) and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less the related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such funds shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of components of the Department, or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates which will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payments for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus found in the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses considered) above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund. There shall be transferred to the fund the stocks of supplies, equipment, other assets, liabilities, and unpaid obligations relating to the services which the Secretary determines will be performed through the fund.

FUNDS TRANSFER

SEC. 425. The Secretary may, when authorized in an appropriation Act in any fiscal year, transfer funds from one appropriation to another within the Department, except that no appropriation for any fiscal year shall be either increased or decreased pursuant to this section by more than 5 per centum and no such transfer shall result in increasing any such appropriation above the amount authorized to be appropriated therefor.

SEAL OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 426. The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department of such design as the Secretary shall approve. Judicial notice shall be taken of such seal.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 427. (a) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year, prepare and transmit a report to the President for transmission to the Congress concerning the activities of the Department during that fiscal year. Such report shall—

(1) include a statement of the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department which are consistent with the purposes of the Department as specified in section 102 and the findings of this Act as specified in section 101;

(2) contain an assessment of the progress made during that fiscal year and anticipated future progress toward the attainment of—

(A) the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department specified pursuant to paragraph (1);

(B) the effective and efficient management of the Department; and

(C) the coordination of the functions of the Department;

(3) contain and analyze objective data concerning—

(A) changing trends in education, as measured by indicators such as enrollments, expenditures, and numbers of teachers and other categories of professional and related personnel;

(B) areas of critical concern such as education of the disadvantaged and education in rural and urban areas; and

(C) the performance of the American educational system, as measured by such indicators as the overall results of student testing on generally recognized standard examinations for entrance to secondary and postsecondary institutions;

(4) include budget projections for the five fiscal years succeeding the fiscal year for which the report is made which are based on actual or anticipated appropriations for the fiscal year for which the report is made; and

(5) contain a separate section on the recommendations made by the Federal Interagency Committee on Education regarding the improvement of the coordination and development of Federal education programs.

(b) (1) In preparing and developing the report required by subsection (a), the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consult with members of the public, including representatives of parents, students, educators, Indian tribes, State and local governments, and other organizations and individuals. Within ninety days after the transmission of such report to the Congress, the Secretary shall hold public hearings in the District of Columbia and in such other locations as the Secretary deems appropriate to maximize public participation.

(2) The Secretary may reimburse any person for expenses reasonably incurred in the course of consultation or hearings under paragraph (1) if such person—

(A) has made or is likely to make a material contribution to the work of the Department; and

(B) could not otherwise participate fully and effectively in such consultation.

(3) For purposes of this section, the term "person" shall have the same meaning as in section 551(2) of title 5, United States Code.

RELATIONSHIP TO GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS ACT

SEC. 428. Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the General Education Provisions Act shall apply to functions transferred by this Act to the extent applicable immediately prior to the effective date of this Act.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 429. Subject to any limitation on appropriations applicable with respect to any function transferred to the Secretary, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and to enable the Secretary to administer and manage the Department. Funds appropriated in accordance with this section shall remain available until expended.

TITLE V—TRANSITIONAL, SAVINGS, AND CONFORMING PROVISIONS

TRANSFER AND ALLOCATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS AND PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the personnel employed in connection with, and the assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available to or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, subject to section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, are hereby transferred to the Secretary for appropriate allocation. Unexpended funds transferred pursuant to this subsection shall be used only for the purposes for which the funds were originally authorized and appropriated.

(b) Positions expressly specified by statute or reorganization plan to carry out functions transferred by this Act, personnel occupying those positions on the effective date of this Act, and personnel authorized to receive compensation in such positions at the rate prescribed for offices and positions at level I, II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5312 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, on the effective date of this Act, shall be subject to the provisions of section 503.

EFFECT ON PERSONNEL

SEC. 502. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the transfer pursuant to this title of full-time personnel (except special Government employees) and part-time personnel holding permanent positions shall not cause any such employee to be separated or reduced in grade or compensation for one year after such transfer or after the effective date of this Act, whichever is later.

(b) Any person who, on the day before the effective date of this Act, held a position compensated in accordance with the Executive schedule prescribed in chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, and who, without a break in service, is appointed in the Department to a position having duties comparable to the duties performed immediately preceding such appointment shall continue to be compensated in such new position at not less than the rate provided for such previous position for the duration of the service of such person in such new position.

AGENCY TERMINATIONS

SEC. 503. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, whenever all of the functions of any agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, have been terminated or transferred by this Act from such agency, commission, or other body, or component thereof, such agency, commission, or other body, or component, shall terminate. If an agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, terminates pursuant to the provisions of the preceding sentence, each position and office therein which was expressly authorized by law, or the incumbent of which was authorized to receive compensation at the rates prescribed for an office or position at level II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5313 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, shall terminate.

INCIDENTAL TRANSFERS

SEC. 504. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, at such time or times as such Director shall provide, is authorized and directed to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the transfer of functions which relate to or are utilized by an officer, agency, commission or other body or component thereof, affected by this Act, and to make such additional incidental dispositions of personnel, assets, liabilities, grants, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for the termination of the affairs of all agencies, commissions, offices, and other bodies terminated by this Act and for such further measures and dispositions as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 505. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, grants, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges—

(1) which have been issued, made, granted, or allowed to become effective by the President, any Federal department or agency or official thereof, or by a court of competent jurisdiction, in the performance of functions which are transferred under this Act to the Department or the Secretary, and shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or revoked in accordance with the law by the President, the Secretary, or other authorized official, a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(2) which are in effect at the time this Act takes effect,

(b) (1) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceedings, including notices of proposed rulemaking, or any application for any license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance pending on the effective date of this Act before any department, agency, commission, or component thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings and applications, to the extent that they relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued. Orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or revoked by the Secretary, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to prohibit the discontinuance or modification of any such proceeding under the same terms and conditions and to the same extent that such proceeding could have been discontinued or modified if this Act had not been enacted.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to promulgate regulations providing for the orderly transfer of proceedings continued under paragraph (1) to the Department.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (e)—

(1) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the effective date of this Act, and

(2) in all such suits, proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

(d) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in the official capacity of such individual as an officer or any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act.

(e) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any department or agency, or officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer, is a party to a suit, and under this Act any function of such department, agency, or officer is transferred to the Secretary or any other official, then such suit shall be continued with the appropriate official of the Department substituted or added as a party.

(f) Orders and actions of the Secretary in the exercise of functions transferred under this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions had been by the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions, immediately preceding their transfer. Any statutory requirements relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Secretary.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 506. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remainder of this Act nor the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall be affected thereby.

REFERENCE

SEC. 507. With respect to any functions transferred by this Act and exercised after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any department, commission, or agency or to any officer or office the functions of which are so transferred shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary or Department.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 508. (a) Section 19(d)(1) of title 3, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately before the period a comma and the following: "Secretary of Education".

(b) Section 101 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The Department of Education.".

(c) Section 5312 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(15) Secretary of Education.".

(d) Section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(67) Under Secretary of Education.".

(e) Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(122) Assistant Secretaries of Education (6).

"(123) Director of the Office for Civil Rights of the Department of Education.

"(124) Inspector General of the Department of Education.

"(125) General Counsel of the Department of Education.".

(f) Section 5316 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(144) Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependent Children of the Department of Education.

"(145) Additional Officer, Department of Education.".

(g) Section 5 of the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act is amended—

(1) by inserting "of Health and Welfare, the Secretary of Education," after "Secretary"; and

(2) by striking out "the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Education,".

AMENDMENT TO THE COMPREHENSIVE EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ACT

SEC. 509. Section 306 of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 is amended to read as follows:

"CONSULTATION WITH THE SECRETARIES OF EDUCATION AND OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

"SEC. 306. The Secretary of Labor shall consult with the Secretary of Health and Human Services with respect to arrangements for services of a health or human services character under this Act. The Secretary of Labor shall consult with the Secretary of Education with respect to arrangements for services of an educational nature under this Act, and the Secretary of Education shall solicit the advice and comments of State educational agencies with respect to education services. Such education services include but are not limited to basic or general education; educational programs conducted for offenders; institutional training; health care, child care, and other supportive services; and new careers and job restructuring in the health, education, and welfare professions. When the Secretary of Labor arranges for the provision of basic education and vocational training directly, pursuant to the provisions of this title, the Secretary of Labor shall obtain the approval of the Secretary of Education for such arrangements.".

AMENDMENT TO THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT OF 1965

SEC. 510. Section 103(c)(2)(B) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall transmit the information required by this subparagraph to the Secretary of Education not later than February 1 of each year.".

REDESIGNATION

SEC. 511. (a) The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is hereby redesignated the Department of Health and Human Services, and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is hereby redesignated the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

(b) Any reference to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, or any other official of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in any law, rule, regulation, certificate, directive, instruction, or other official paper in force on the effective date of this Act shall be deemed to refer and apply to the Department of Health and Human Services, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, or the appropriate official of the Department of Health and Human Services, respectively, except to the extent such reference is to a function transferred to the Secretary under this Act.

TRANSITION

SEC. 512. With the consent of the appropriate department or agency head concerned, the Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of such officers, employees, and other personnel of the departments and agencies of the executive branch for such period of time as may reasonably be needed to facilitate the orderly transfer of functions under this Act.

TITLE VI—EFFECTIVE DATE AND INTERIM APPOINTMENTS

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 601. (a) The provisions of this Act shall take effect one hundred eighty days after the Secretary first takes office, or on such earlier date as the President may prescribe and publish in the Federal Register, except that at any time after the date of enactment of this Act—

(1) any of the officers provided for in title II of this Act may be nominated and appointed as provided in such title, and

(2) the Secretary may promulgate regulations pursuant to section 505(b)(2) of this Act.

(b) Funds available to any department or agency (or any official or component thereof), the functions of which are transferred to the Secretary by this Act, may, with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, be used to pay the compensation and expenses of any officer appointed pursuant to this Act until such time as funds for that purpose are otherwise available.

INTERIM APPOINTMENTS

SEC. 602. (a) In the event that one or more officers required by this Act to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall not have entered upon office on the effective date of this Act and notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the President may designate an officer in the executive branch to act in such office for one hundred twenty days or until the office is filled as provided in this Act, whichever occurs first.

(b) Any officer acting in an office in the Department pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for such office under this Act.

Passed the Senate September 28 (legislative day, September 26), 1978.

S. 210. A bill to establish a Department of Education; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1979

● Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce along with Senators MAGNUSON, PELL, NUNN, WILLIAMS, PERCY, and 37 of my distinguished colleagues, a bill to establish a separate Cabinet Department of Education.

This bill is similar to the bill passed overwhelmingly by the Senate by a vote of 72 to 11 last year.

The bill has been considered for over 2 years by the Governmental Affairs Committee. Last year, the committee held 10 days of hearings on the bill and heard from over 100 witnesses. Last year the committee unanimously reported legislation to create a Department of Education. I am grateful for the support given by committee members for the bill, and particularly for the good cooperation and support of the committee's ranking minority member, Senator PERCY. I am looking forward to working with the committee again this year to establish the Department of Education.

It has wide support. Liberals, conservatives, Republicans, and Democrats recognize the importance of the need for the Department of Education. Nearly 100 organizations support the creation of a Department of Education. It is supported by a large number of organizations representing parents, teachers, students and the handicapped. In addition, this is the first time in history the American Society for Public Administration has supported creation of a new Cabinet Department. Mr. President, I technologies, declining school enrollments, failing confidence in public education, high drop-out rates, increasing numbers of older citizens interested in lifelong careers, displaced homemakers, and a myriad of other factors present new challenges to our educational institutions.

How can we best meet our present and future education needs? The challenge we face today at the Federal level is how can we best manage our existing Federal Education programs? How can we best supplement and complement the efforts of States and local governments in their education efforts? Are we able to do this efficiently and effectively? A Department of Education will provide us the best opportunity to meet these challenges.

Let us look at the existing situation for education now in our Government. The largest single concentration of education programs is located in the education division of HEW. HEW's responsibilities are already too immense. Its budget is the third largest of all Government structures in the world—exceeded only by the total budgets of the U.S. Government and the Soviet Union. The HEW secretary is concerned with health insurance, hospital cost containment, welfare reform, social security, medicare, medical research, food and drug regulation and education. Last year the HEW Inspector General found over $7 billion of waste, inefficiency, fraud and abuse in that Department. This amount alone is larger than the budgets of five other existing departments.

is no opportunity for an education commissioner to grasp the serious challenges of the Office of Education. We have had 13 U.S. Commissioners of Education in the past 12 years. Our 14th Commissioner, Ernest Boyer, has announced he will resign his post later this year. During our hearings last year, I asked six former Commissioners about this shocking statistic. They told me it is impossible for the Commissioner to have any meaningful impact given the low-level place of education in the large HEW bureaucracy.

We might ask—why a new Department? Cannot our objectives be achieved by elevating education within HEW? Cannot we eliminate the dual conflict between the Commissioner of Education and the Assistant Secretary of Education and elevate one position to a sub-Cabinet level? This alternative has been considered by the administration and by the committee. It was found unacceptable. A Department of Defense model or sub-Cabinet structure would merely serve to increase the power of a super-Secretary. In HEW now the size of the Office of the Secretary is twice that of the Education Division. Policymaking and planning would still be in the Secretary's office. Elevating education into a sub-Cabinet would only increase the layers of bureaucracy that now exist above education. Thus, the present situation cannot be improved by a mere "elevation" of education within HEW—the Department is just too big. The missions are too diverse.

ask unanimous consent that the list of organizations suporting the department be included in the Record at the conclusion of my statement.

In his state of the Union address yesterday, the President reaffirmed the administration's strong support for the creation of a Department of Education. President Carter said the new department "will enable the Federal Government to be a more responsive and reliable partner with States, localities, and private institutions that have primary responsibility for education.". He speaks from experience. His first public office was chairman of a local school board.

The idea of a Cabinet Department of Education has been discussed for more than half a century. I first introduced a bill calling for such a cabinet department in the 89th Congress. Since that time my belief in the need for a separate education department has been many times reinforced. We need a Department of Education now more than ever.

American education is the foundation of our society. Today, more than 60 million people in the United States are directly involved in education. Total education spending in our country exceeds $180 billion.

Alvin Toffler, in discussing his book, "Learning for Tomorrow," stated:

> Young people in our schools today are going to live in a world radically different from the one we know—and a world that will be undergoing continual, and in all likelihood, accelerating change.

The need to provide equal access to education for all Americans, advancing

A separate department can actually reduce administrative costs and waste by streamlining the bureaucracy and consolidating scattered programs. The Senate bill folds into the Department 170 scattered Federal education programs. Placing these under one umbrella will reduce paperwork, and conflicting rules and regulations. The Senate bill also contains a provision mandating a stiff ceiling on the number of personnel employed by the new Department. Taking the "E" out of HEW is a serious attempt to break HEW down to manageable proportions, allowing the HEW secretary to devote more time, attention, and scrutiny to massive health and welfare programs. Good management cuts waste and costs. Creation of a Department of Education will represent better management of education programs, and better management of health and welfare programs.

HEW's Education Division's budget this year is expected to be approximately $11 billion. This amount alone is larger than the existing budgets of six other Cabinet departments, and yet it is buried layers deep within the massive $185 billion Department of Health, Education and Welfare. There is no accountability for education in the present Federal education structure. There is no one to insure that education programs are administered effectively, no one to speak up for education in the President's Cabinet, no one for States and localities, citizens, parents, teachers, and students to look to in the Federal Government for educational assistance.

I am amazed at the high turnover of Education Commissioners in HEW. There

Some argue for the sub-Cabinet model because they feel education needs to be coordinated with health and welfare. Rufus Miles, who served as Assistant Secretary for Administration in HEW for 12 years, responded to this argument before the committee. He stated—

> In all my years at HEW, I never saw any significant coordination of programs and functions between the Office of Education and the other components of HEW. . . . Actually the important coordination that needs to be undertaken is not so much between the Office of Education programs and the health and welfare programs within HEW, but between education and as it exists within the Education Division of HEW, and the education programs of the rest of the government. . . , This coordination within HEW is simply a figment of imagination.

Coordination can be improved by a separate department. For example, some education programs have linkages with agriculture, labor and energy. Education is fundamental to most Government programs. The elevation of the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to the secretarial level will provide an important mechanism for improved interagency coordnation of education-related programs. A Secretary of Education will be in a better position to coordinate health-related programs with the Secretary of Health and Human Services. A Secretary of Education could better coordinate labor-related programs with a Secretary of Labor, and so forth.

Most importantly, a Secretary of Education must begin the challenge of coordnating the myrad of eduation programs already existing within the education division. The American Society of Public Administration's resolution supporting the Department states:

> The addition of another Cabinet Department would not unduly stretch the President's span of major organization of control. On the other hand, coordination of education programs to minimise unnecessary administrative burdens and expense for educational institutions and to rationalize inconsistent educational policies would be facilitated if a Cabinet official were given this as a major assignment.

Does the creation of a separate Department of Education mean there will be Federal control of education? The answer is simply "no." From the beginning of the United States responsibility for public education has rested in the hands of State and local governments. It is part of our way of life. The diversity and individualism that comes with State and local control is what makes the American educational system one of the greatest the world has ever known. At least 38 percent of the budgets of State and local governments is spent for education. Education policymaking has resided, and will always reside, with State and local boards of education and citizens. This concern was discussed in depth during floor consideration of the bill last year.

The Governmental Affairs Committee carefully considered the question of whether a department means Federal interference in or dominance of State and local policymaking. States and their political subdivisions have the constitu> ation among Federal, state, and local education agencies in their appropriate roles. The establishment of a Department of Education would make clear the lines of Federal responsibility and authority in the educational effort. It would make it more possible for parents, educators, and other citizens . . . to make (education programs) more fully responsive to their needs.

The bill underlines the unique relationship of the Federal Government with States and localities in the area of education. It provides for an assistant Secretary to perform intergovernmental functions and also creates an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council would act as a continual check on the Department of Education for the impact of its programs on States and localities.

One area of Federal neglect has been in the area of citizen involvement. Underlying the strength of the American educational system has been the traditionally heavy involvement of citizens and parents in the State and local educational processes. Parent, citizen and student involvement will be an important function of the Department and will rebuild lost confidence in education. The Department will be designed to encourage parent, public and student participation in the development and implementation of departmental programs.

Structurally, the bill creating the new Department goes to great lengths to balance all educational interests and give adequate recognition to each. For example, the bill specifically provides for visibility for education assistance to States and localities in delivering effective education and training and adult community services.

Handicapped. An Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services will combine the functions of the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped and the Office of Human Development Service's Rehabilitation Services Administration into a comprehensive program of education and rehabilitative services for the handicapped.

Civil rights. An Office for Civil Rights—independent of the Department's programs headed by an executive level IV, who reports directly to the Secretary—will continue and improve the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities. The bill elevates the status of the civil rights director by creating a level IV position—subject to Senate confirmation. The Director will have the authority to issue an independent report directly to the President, to Congress and the Secretary on the status of civil rights enforcement and issue recommendations for its improvement.

Mr. President, I believe the bill introduced today is greatly needed.

It will significantly improve the design and management of Federal education programs.

It directs the new department to involve parents, students, and the public more directly in developing and implementing education programs.

tional right to determine their own education needs and policies. The bill reinforces this principle. The bill states the intent of Congress in the establishment of the Department of Education is "to protect the rights of State, local and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, competency testing and selection of curricula and program content." It is our intent to also "strengthen the direction of such governments and institutions over their education programs and policies."

Amendments introduced last year by Senators ROTH and DANFORTH addressed this concern. These amendments are contained in the present bill and have been further refined. The bill recognizes the primary responsibility for education resides with the State, local and tribal governments, public and nonpublic education institutions, communities and families. The bill clarifies that in our Federal system of Government, the primary public responsibility for education is reserved, respectively, to the States and to their diverse instrumentalities.

The creation of a Department of Education is supported by State and local groups who say they fear more Federal intrusion will be caused by the existing fragmented, uncoordinated, unaccountable, and low-level bureaucracy. In testimony before the Senate committee, the National PTA said:

> Far from being an obstacle to the local control of education, the National PTA feels that the establishment of a Department of Education would produce successful cooper-

a principal elementary/secondary officer on an equal footing with the principal postsecondary officer. The Education Department will be concerned with all aspects of the broad process of education, from nutrition, to museums, elementary/secondary education, postsecondary education, occupational training, educational research, equal educational opportunity, training of the handicapped, and more. No one interest will dominate another.

Other features of the bill include:

Elementary and secondary education: An Office of Elementary and Secondary Education will administer approximately $6 billion for elementary and secondary education programs participated in by more than 48 million students. The Office of Elementary and Secondary Education will contain a new Office of Nonpublic Education.

Postsecondary education. The Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education will have program spending authority of approximately $3.6 billion. He or she will help coordinate programs designed to improve postsecondary educational opportunities.

Research and improvement. An Office of Educational Research and Improvement, containing the National Institute of Education, the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education, the National Center for Educational Statistics, and certain science education programs, will assist in the development of new knowledge about the educational process.

Occupational, adult, and community education. This office will provide needed

It recognizes the importance of equal education opportunity and the need to effectively enforce the respective laws of the land.

It stresses the importance of maintaining good intergovernmental relations, and closer cooperation with State, local and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

It balances educational interests by placing them on an equal footing with each other.

It works toward strengthening interagency coordination of Federal education programs.

It gives proper recognition to and increased status for the Department's many and varied components.

I hope the Congress will act expeditiously this year on the legislation. The Committee on Governmental Affairs will hold hearings on the bill February 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I recently received a letter from former U.S. Commissioner of Education Terrel Bell, in which he succinctly states the need for the Department of Education. I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my statement.

I urge my colleagues to join with me this year to support a Cabinet Department of Education. We need a Department of Education.

There being no objection, the bill and material were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 210

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Department of Education Organization Act of 1978".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

Sec. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) education is fundamental to the growth and achievement of the Nation;

(2) there is a continual need to provide equal access to education for all Americans;

(3) the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with State, local, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities and families;

(4) in our Federal system, the primary responsibility for education is reserved respectively to the States and to their diverse instrumentalities;

(5) the dispersion of education programs

(4) encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the decisionmaking process relating to education, including the development and improvement of education programs and services;

(5) enable the Federal Government to coordinate education activities and programs more effectively through interagency cooperation, technical assistance, and evaluation of program effectiveness;

(6) (A) provide assistance in the support of basic and applied educational research; (B) collect and analyze information on the progress and condition of education in the United States; and (C) work with State, local, and tribal officials, public and nonpublic educational institutions, community organizations, parents, and students to implement the findings of such research at the local level; and

(7) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, tribal, and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated educational needs of such agencies, especially with respect to the simplification of the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, as well as the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens and constraints, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds.

STATE AND LOCAL RESPONSIBILITIES FOR EDUCATION

Sec. 103. It is the intention of the Congress in the creation of the Department of Education to protect the rights of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, competency testing, and selection of cur-

Education, and Welfare.

across a large number of Federal agencies has led to fragmented, duplicative, and often inconsistent Federal policies relating to education;

(6) there is a lack of coordination of Federal resources for State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions;

(7) Presidential and public consideration of issues relating to education is hindered by the present organizational position of education programs in the executive branch of the Government;

(8) the importance of education is increasing as new technologies and alternative approaches to traditional education are considered, as society becomes more complex, and as equal opportunities in education and employment are promoted; and

(9) therefore, it is in the public interest and general welfare of the United States to establish a Department of Education.

PURPOSES

SEC. 102. It is the purpose of this Act to establish a Department of Education in order to—

(1) enable education to receive the appropriate emphasis at the Federal level;

(2) continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to ensuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities;

(3) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents, and students to improve the quality of education, while acknowledging the right of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions to formulate policies, choose curricula, decide administrative questions, and choose program content with respect to their educational programs;

ricula and program content, and to strengthen and improve the direction of such governments and institutions over their educational programs and policies.

Sec. 419. (a) The Secretary is authorized to—

(1) acquire (by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise), construct, improve, repair, operate, and maintain schools and related facilities, laboratories, research and testing sites and facilities, quarters and related accommodations for employees and dependents of employees of the Department, personal property (including patents), or any interest therein, as may be necessary; and

(2) provide by contract or otherwise for the establishment of eating facilities and other necessary facilities for the health and welfare of employees of the Department at its installations, and purchase and maintain equipment therefor.

(b) The authority available to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under section 524 of the Education Amendments of 1976 shall also be available to the Secretary.

(c) The authority granted by subsection (a) of this section shall be available only with respect to facilities of a special purpose nature that cannot readily be reassigned for similar Federal activities and are not otherwise available for assignment to the Department by the Administrator of General Services.

FACILITIES AT REMOTE LOCATIONS

Sec. 420. (a) The Secretary is authorized to provide, construct, or maintain for employees and their dependents stationed at remote locations as necessary and when not otherwise available at such remote locations—

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) dining facilities;

(4) audiovisual equipment, accessories, and supplies for recreation and training;

(5) reimbursement for food, clothing, medicine, and other supplies furnished by such employees in emergencies for the temporary relief of distressed persons;

(6) living and working quarters and facilities; and

(7) transportation for dependents of employees of the Department to the nearest appropriate educational facilities.

(b) The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of the cost of such work or services or to refund excess sums when necessary.

USE OF FACILITIES

SEC. 421. (a) (1) To carry out the functions of the Secretary, the Secretary may use the research, equipment, services, and facilities of any agency or instrumentality of the United States or of any State, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any Indian tribe or tribal organization, or of any foreign government, with the consent of and with or without reimbursement to such agency, instrumentality, State, political subdivision, Indian tribe or tribal organization, or foreign government.

(2) Notwithstanding the transfer of func-

GIFTS AND BEQUESTS

SEC. 423. The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts, bequests and devises of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts, bequests, and devises of money and proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts, bequests, or devises shall be deposited in the Treasury in a separate fund and shall be disbursed upon the order of the Secretary. Property accepted pursuant to this section, and the proceeds thereof, shall be used as nearly as possible in accordance with the terms of the gift, bequest, or devise donating such property. For the purposes of Federal income, estate, and gift taxes, property accepted under this section shall be considered as a gift, bequest, or devise to the United States.

WORKING CAPITAL FUND

SEC. 424. The Secretary is authorized to establish a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interests of economy and efficiency, including such services as a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its components; central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services; office space, central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and a central library service. The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing capital (which appropriations are authorized) and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as concerning the activities of the Department during that fiscal year. Such report shall—

(1) include a statement of the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department which are consistent with the purposes of the Department as specified in section 102 and the findings of this Act as specified in section 101;

(2) contain an assessment of the progress made during that fiscal year and anticipated future progress toward the attainment of—

(A) the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department specified pursuant to paragraph (1);

(B) the effective and efficient management of the Department; and

(C) the coordination of the functions of the Department;

(3) contain and analyze objective data concerning—

(A) changing trends in education, as measured by indicators such as enrollments, expenditures, and numbers of teachers and other categories of professional and related personnel; and

(B) areas of critical concern such as education of the disadvantaged and education in rural and urban areas.

(4) include budget projections for the five fiscal years succeeding the fiscal year for which the report is made which are based on actual or anticipated appropriations for the fiscal year for which the report is made: and

(5) contain a separate section on the recommendations made by the Federal Interagency Committee on Education regarding the improvement of the coordination and development of Federal education programs.

(b)(1) In preparing and developing the report required by subsection (a), the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consult with members of the public, including representatives of parents, stutions from the Secretary of Defense to the Secretary under section 304, all personnel performing such functions shall be treated, for the purpose of access to services and facilities provided by the Department of Defense, as employees of the Department of Defense.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to permit public and private agencies, corporations, associations, Indian tribes or tribal organizations, other organizations, or individuals to use any real property, or any facilities, structures, or other improvement thereon, under the custody and control of the Secretary for Department purposes. The Secretary shall permit the use of such property, facilities, structures, or improvements under such terms and rates and for such period as may be in the public interest, except that the periods of such uses may not exceed five years. The Secretary may require permittees under this section to recondition and maintain, at their own expense, the real property, facilities, structures, and improvements used by such permittees to a standard satisfactory to the Secretary. This subsection shall not apply to excess property as defined in section 3(e) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 472 (e)).

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of such cost of the equipment or facilities provided or to refund excess sums when necessary.

COPYRIGHTS AND PATENTS

SEC. 422. The Secretary is authorized to acquire any of the following described rights if the property acquired thereby is for use by or for, or useful to, the Department:

(1) copyrights, patents, and applications for patents, designs, processes, and manufacturing data;

(2) licenses under copyrights, patents, and applications for patents; and

(3) releases, before suit is brought, for past infringement of patents or copyrights.

the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less the related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such funds shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of components of the Department, or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates which will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payments for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus found in the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses considered) above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund. There shall be transferred to the fund the stocks of supplies, equipment, other assets, liabilities, and unpaid obligations relating to the services which the Secretary determines will be performed through the fund.

FUNDS TRANSFER

SEC. 425. The Secretary may, when authorized in an appropriation Act in any fiscal year, transfer funds from one appropriation to another within the Department, except that no appropriation for any fiscal year shall be either increased or decreased pursuant to this section by more than 5 per centum and no such transfer shall result in increasing any such appropriation above the amount authorized to be appropriated therefor.

SEAL OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 426. The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department of such design as the Secretary shall approve. Judicial ontice shall be taken of such seal.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 427. (a) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year, prepare and transmit a report to the President for transmission to the Congress

dents, educators, Indian tribes, State and local governments, and other organizations and individuals. Within ninety days after the transmission of such report to the Congress, the Secretary shall hold public hearings in the District of Columbia and in such other locations as the Secretary deems appropriate to maximize public participation.

(2) The Secretary may reimburse any person for expenses reasonably incurred in the course of consultation or hearings under paragraph (1) if such person—

(A) has made or is likely to make a material contribution to the work of the Department: and

(B) could not otherwise participate fully and effectively in such consultation.

(3) For purposes of this section, the term "person" shall have the same meaning as in section 551(2) of title 5, United States Code.

STUDY OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF FEDERAL INDIAN EDUCATION PROGRAMS

SEC. 428. (a) The Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall jointly conduct a comprehensive study on the administration of Indian education programs by the Federal Government. In conducting the study, the Secretaries and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall consult with Indians, Alaskan Natives, Aleuts, affected Indian tribes, and Indian organizations.

(b) The study required by this section shall contain—

(1) an analysis of the problems in the Federal administration of Indian education programs;

(2) recommendations for administrative and programmatic improvements in such programs; and

(3) recommendations concerning the proper organizational structure for Indian education programs within the Federal Government, including an analysis concerning the consolidation of Indian education programs and the transfer of such programs to the Department of Education.

(c) The study required by this section shall be transmitted to the Congress and the President not later than six months after the date of enactment of this Act.

RELATIONSHIP TO GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS ACT

SEC. 429. Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the General Education Provisions Act shall apply to functions transferred by this Act to the extent applicable immediately prior to the effective date of this Act.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 430. Subject to any limitation on appropriations applicable with respect to any function transferred to the Secretary, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and to enable the Secretary to administer and manage the Department. Funds appropriated in accordance with this section shall remain available until expended.

TITLE V—TRANSITIONAL, SAVINGS, AND CONFORMING PROVISIONS

TRANSFER AND ALLOCATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS AND PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the personnal employed in connection with, and the assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available to or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, subject to section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, are transferred to the Secretary for appropriate allocation. Unexpended funds transferred pursuant to this agency, commission, or other body, or component thereof, such agency, commission, or other body, or component, shall terminate. If an agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, terminates pursuant to the provisions of the preceding sentence, each position and office therein which was expressly authorized by law, or the incumbent of which was authorized to receive compensation at the rates prescribed for an office or position at level II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5313 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, shall terminate.

INCIDENTAL TRANSFERS

SEC. 504. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, at such time or times as such Director shall provide, is authorized and directed to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the transfer of functions which relate to or are utilized by an officer, agency, commission or other body, or component thereof, affected by this Act, and to make such additional incidental dispositions of personnel, assets, liabilities, grants, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for the termination of the affairs of all agencies, commissions, offices, and other bodies terminated by this Act and for such further measures and dispositions as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 505. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, grants, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges—

(1) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the effective date of this Act, and

(2) in all such suits, proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

(d) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in the official capacity of such individual as an officer or any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act.

(e) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any department or agency, or officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer, is a party to a suit, and under this Act any function of such department, agency, or officer is transferred to the Secretary or any other official of the Department, then such suit shall be continued with the Secretary or other appropriate official of the Department substituted or added as a party.

(f) Orders and actions of the Secretary in the exercise of functions transferred under this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions had been by the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions, immediately preceding their transfer. Any statutory requirements relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Secretary.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 506. If any provision of this Act or subsection shall be used only for the purposes for which the funds were originally authorized and appropriated.

(b) Positions expressly specified by statute or reorganization plan to carry out functions transferred by this Act, personnel occupying those positions on the effective date of this Act, and personnel authorized to receive compensation in such positions at the rate prescribed for offices and positions at level I, II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5312 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, on the effective date of this Act, shall be subject to the provisions of section 502.

EFFECT ON PERSONNEL

Sec. 502. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the transfer pursuant to this title of full-time personnel (except special Government employees) and part-time personnel holding permanent positions shall not cause any such employee to be separated or reduced in grade or compensation for one year after such transfer or after the effective date of this Act, whichever is later.

(b) Any person who, on the date before the effective date of this Act, held a position compensated in accordance with the Executive Schedule prescribed in chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, and who, without a break in service, is appointed in the Department to a position having duties comparable to the duties performed immediately preceding such appointment shall continue to be compensated in such new position at not less than the rate provided for such previous position for the duration of the service of such person in such new position.

AGENCY TERMINATIONS

Sec. 503. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, whenever all of the functions of any agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, have been terminated or transferred by this Act from that

(1) which have been issued, made, granted, or allowed to become effective by the President, any Federal department or agency or official thereof, or by a court of competent jurisdiction, in the performance of functions which are transferred under this Act to the Department or the Secretary, and shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or revoked in accordance with the law by the President, the Secretary, or other authorized official, a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(2) which are in effect at the time this Act takes effect,

(b)(1) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceedings, including notices of proposed rulemaking, or any application for any license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance pending on the effective date of this Act before any department, agency, commission, or component thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings and applications, to the extent that they relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued. Orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or revoked by the Secretary, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to prohibit the discontinuance or modification of any such proceedings under the same terms and conditions and to the same extent that such proceeding could have been discontinued or modified if this Act had not been enacted.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to promulgate regulations providing for the orderly transfer of proceedings continued under paragraph (1) to the Department.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (e)—

the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remainder of this Act nor the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall be affected thereby.

REFERENCE

Sec. 507. With respect to any functions transferred by this Act and exercised after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any department, commission, or agency or to any officer or office the functions of which are so transferred shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary or Department.

Hon. ABE RIBICOFF,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR RIBICOFF: In response to your letter, I am pleased to express my continued support for legislation that you have been sponsoring to establish a separate U.S. Department of Education. I want to respond specifically to the allegations that have been made in previous testimony that the creation of a separate Department of Education will lead to more Federal control and dominance. Then, I would also like to respond to the argument that a Department of Education will merely add to an increased bureaucracy without improving management effectiveness and coordination in education.

In my view, a separate Department of Education will be more responsive to the needs of schools and colleges in the United States. It is difficult for the education community to have access to the Secretary of HEW. The Department is so large and the problems are so complex that the Secretary simply does not have time to meet with education leaders, hear their problems, and be responsive to them. Moreover, a separate Department of Education would be able to devote more time on the Cabinet level to top White House staff members, to the Office of Management and Budget, and to the President. This simply is not the case now because of the enormous size and complexity of HEW. With three out of ten Americans in the United States involved in education on a fulltime basis, either as students or as employees, a separate Department of Education is justified and necessary. Such a department can be more responsive and more sensitively aware of the problems and concerns of American education. This should lead to more enlightened legislation and administration and proper deliberation and hearing before decision making takes place. Thus, the bureaucratic tangle that exists in HEW would be greatly simplified if education became a separate department. The health and welfare programs would benefit as well as would the education programs through the creation of a separate U.S. Department of Education.

It is natural for leaders both inside and outside of government to want to have some of their major problems heard by the person who sits at the head of the organization. This is simply another good argument for a separate department. There is no time for the Secretary of HEW to fill many of these needs, because of the pressures on his time.

I hope that you will be successful in getting your legislation passed. American education will benefit if you are successful, and we all owe you a debt of gratitude for the leadership that you are displaying in this matter.

Sincerely,

T. H. BELL,
Commissioner of Higher Education. ●

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to support as an original cosponsor this legislation to create a Cabinet Department of Education. I supported this measure in the 95th Congress and I do so at the outset of the 96th Congress with the conviction that this legislation is more important than ever to our national interest.

The bill introduced today is essentially the same measure which passed the Senate by a wide margin in the last days of the 95th Congress. The principles underpinning it have been tested repeatedly in hearings, in debate before the Committee, and on the Senate floor, in the process of producing the Department of Education Organization Act.

Since we last introduced this measure in early 1976, great strides have been made toward the actual establishment of this much-needed department. When the Governmental Affairs Committee reported this bill for full Senate consideration last August, S. 991 had over 50 bipartisan cosponsors, had been the subject of 10 days of hearings with more than 100 witnesses, and had been extensively reviewed and thoroughly discussed by the committee staff, the administration, and interested citizens from throughout the Nation. And, it received a substantial vote of confidence from the Senate when it passed on September 28, 1978, by a vote of 72 yeas to 11 nays. Unfortunately, it was impossible to bring this important measure to the floor of the House of Representatives for its consideration during the last few days of the session, and S. 991 did not receive full congressional approval prior to adjournment.

I do believe, however, that we still have the momentum to get expeditious approval of the Department of Education Organization Act early in this Congress, because I think that most of my colleagues still share my view that our Government has no national educational policy and no coordinated system of providing educational services to the State and local educational agencies, our colleges and universities, and most importantly, our Nation's youth. It is trative regulation. It should lead to more concern for the problems of education and for the realities of local and state control. With a Cabinet-level official in charge of education and responsible for the administration of Federal policy, there should be much more awareness of the traditions of local autonomy and grass roots control and governance of education. And all of this should lead to less control and less Federal dominance than we have at the present time.

More effective management and coordination of education should result from a separate Department of Education. Anyone who has worked in the HEW bureaucracy knows of the cumbersome decision-making structure that exists there. I don't express this as a criticism but merely express it as a normal result of the unreasonable size and complexity of that department. It is simply too large and unwieldy. During the time that I served in Washington as Deputy Commissioner and as U.S. Commissioner of Education, I worked under Secretaries Finch, Richardson, Weinburger, and Matthews. All of these men were simply overpowered and overwhelmed with the enormity of the task of trying to manage HEW. Decisions that the Secretary must make are so numerous that they have to be delegated to subordinates. It was extremely difficult to get time on the Secretary's calendar to discuss serious problems in the U.S. Office of Education. Indeed, I found it even difficult to get in to see the Under Secretary at times. So far as education is concerned, these management and coordination difficulties would be greatly simplified if we had a separate Department of Education. I constantly received complaints from school and college leaders and from their organizations and association groups that they simply could not get an audience with the Secretary. Despite the dedication of the conscientious individuals who served as Secretaries of HEW, the task is so enormous and the span of control is so vast that it is impossible to have effective mittee on Governmental Affairs, in consultative assistance from the Committee on Human Resources, and before the Senate. The concept of a Department of Education is well founded and the need for a department to concentrate on the Federal role in this essential policy area escalated as school enrollments decline, as educational technology goes unused, and as local ability to finance education is questioned by tax-saving and tax-limitation measures across the Nation.

The measure which I join in introducing today maintains a proper perspective of a Federal role in education—to assist effectively the States and localities to carry out primary responsibility for the formulation and delivery of educational services. By combining from diverse and frequently competing locations in the Federal Government the many programs affecting our young people, a new Department of Education would facilitate Federal administration of education policies and programs. Such a department is the only way that we can reduce the paperwork burden and excessive Federal regulation and at the same time provide those programs which local government is unable to afford.

The passage of this matter is a high priority for the Congress and for the administration. It is my hope that my colleagues in the Senate will consider this measure favorably and that the leadership of the Senate will clear the way for its earliest possible consideration.●

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I again join Senators RIBICOFF, MAGNUSON, and PELL in intro- our hope that a separate Department of Education will help alleviate this problem and bring some guidance to our fragmented educational programs.

Without going into the actual details of the bill, I would like to share several reasons why I feel a separate department will actually improve education in our Nation today.

I believe that the Federal involvement in education, with its primary goal of equalizing opportunities for all citizens, is a commendable one. These programs have made a great difference in the education of many socially, physically, and economically handicapped children.

But the price for these benefits has often been confusion, fragmentation, duplication, delay, and general frustration with the paperwork and painstaking slowness of Federal bureaucratic processes.

Federal regulations require days, even weeks, of administrative time, often at great expense to school systems. But the mandates do not stop at the administrative levels. Teachers also must spend hours of their time in complying with Federal requirements and completing nebulous and often inane forms when time and effort could be better expended in fulfilling the educational needs of the students.

And all of this time and effort is expended at a price. Only 8 percent of the cost of public education is asumed by the Federal Government.

There is a reason for the burdensome paperwork, for the regulations and for the guidelines. It may not be a good reason, but it is a simple one. The paperwork, the regulations and the guidelines fill the vacuum created by the unconscionable absence of a Federal education policy.

This is not the fault of the executive branch, alone. In a very real sense, Congress must share the blame, because Capitol Hill is responsible for the extraordinary fragmentation in education programs that is now so severe that only a reorganization of Government can respond to the problem.

For example, in addition to the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, 37 other departments and agencies run 130 education programs of their own. We have also played musical chairs with our Commissioners of Education—there have been 13 individuals holding this position in th[illegible] years. With continuity of lea[illegible]p like that, there is little wonder [illegible] bureaucrats write regulations, g[illegible]lines, and prepare new forms to their hearts content.

And, although the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is ultimately responsible, it is difficult for even the most competent and concerned HEW Secretary to be a real spokesman for education when the massive health and welfare needs, with their concurrent extraordinary expenditures, demand all his time and energies.

But not only is the Commissioner of Education's responsibilities fragmented, his voice and opinion have little authority and receive little attention. In hearings on the Department of Education which I chaired in the Governmental and establishes direct lines of authority can go a long way toward the improvement of education. But even more importantly, Congress and the American people need a visible, responsible, high-level Federal official who can be held accountable for the successes of failures of educational programs and policies at the Federal level. Education also needs a strong advocate in the executive branch to delineate its priorities and to assist in solving its problems. A Department of Education can go a long way toward meeting these needs.

But I feel I must take a moment to emphasis that the effective management which will accompany a Department of Education should not mean more control. In the report on S. 991 in the 95th Congress, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, with my strong concurrence, stated emphatically that the responsibility for education policy and curriculum will remain at the State, local, and private levels. However, a Secretary of Education can mean improved accountability, coordination, and advocacy, all of which are important if the Federal Government is going to make its involvement in education meaningful.

Education is an investment of no small measure in our Nation. In 1977, the American people spent $140 billion on education—this is 8 percent of our gross national porduct and more than we spend on national defense. Today, nearly 3 out of every 10 Americans—63.7 million citizens—are directly in- sponsor. He has introduced legislation to create a separate Department of Education in every Congress since the 89th, and he should receive credit for his skillful and successful efforts in guiding the bill through the Senate last year. Credit must also be given, of course, to the distinguished Senator from Illinois, Mr. PERCY, for the role that he played in bringing this bill to passage last year.

The legislation Mr. RIBICOFF is introducing today, S. 210, to create a Cabinet-level Department of Education reflects his longstanding interest in and concern with the whole range of education issues and problems. This bill is the product of many years of hard work—hundreds of hours spent in committee addressing the issues, improving the bill's language and refining its findings and purposes. It is my sincere hope that this year, his efforts and those of so many others will be realized in the creation of a separate Department of Education.

For too long education programs have been smothered in the massive bureaucracy of health and welfare programs administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. They are scattered throughout at least 40 Federal departments, agencies, and bureaus. Over the years, they have received less and less of the attention and priority they deserve.

At the same time, the budget for the Education Division at HEW already exceeds that of the Departments of the Interior, Commerce, Justice, and State. It is easily large enough to constitute and

Affairs Committee, former Commissioner of Education Terrel Bell, testified that—

> The Commissioner is an executive level 6 in the government structure, and in HEW that is one of the lowest forms of human life. . .

He also stated that during his 2 years service as Commissioner of Education, he had the opportunity to meet directly with President Nixon on only one occasion and that was when he was appointed.

This is just one sad example of the frustration of being U.S. Commissioner of Education, and is perhaps one reason why this job changes hands so much. The Commissioner of Education has almost no opportunity for policy input. His decisions and recommendations on education budgets are usually overruled. He is buried within the HEW bureaucracy with very little access to the Secretary of Health, Education, ad Welfare, much less anyone higher.

All the aforementioned problems describe a generally deplorable situation, yet, such is the state of education at the Federal level. It is incumbent on us now to take steps to remedy this problem.

I believe that the first step we must take is to establish a Cabinet-level Department of Education. I am not going to pretend that I believe that a separate Department of Education will solve all our educational problems or guarantee that the quality of these endeavors will be improved. But I do strongly believe that an identifiable, Cabinet-level department which consolidates existing programs, streamlines administration volved in education. And, education is by far the largest expenditure of State and local governments, accounting for more than one-third of their budgets.

The bill which we are introducing today reflects the goals and concerns of citizens throughout our Nation who are interested in improving educational opportunities and wisely spending our educational dollars. It also encompasses the long months of dedicated and diligent work during the 95th Congress which I believe will effectively reorganize our Federal educational effort, reduce fragmentation, give priority attention to these urgent needs and provide more responsive educational services to the youth of our Nation.

Mr. President, I know the Committee on Governmental Affairs intends to move expeditiously on this measure. I urge the Senate to act accordingly so that a Department of Education can become a reality in 1979.●

● Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, last year the Senate passed legislation to create a Federal Department of Education. However, in the closing days of the 95th Congress, the House was unable to complete its action on the bill. I hope that this year the bill will become law, and I am pleased to add my name to the list of cosponsors.

Senator RIBICOFF, chairman of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, which has jurisdiction over creation of Federal executive departments and agencies, has introduced this legislation today. And I cannot think of anyone more qualified than a former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to be its principal justify a separate department.

Creation of a new Department of Education will result in increased efficiency in the management and coordination of education programs administered by the Federal Government. It will result in greater responsiveness at the Federal level to the education needs of this country by consolidating education-related programs under one Federal department.

I know that in West Virginia, school boards have run into problems when dealing with the Education Division at HEW. I can cite numerous examples of delay, time-consuming paperwork, duplication, and confusion which the local school boards have encountered. In fact, one of the main reasons I feel so strongly about this legislation is that I believe that creation of a Cabinet-level Department of Education will result in a substantial reduction in redtape, paperwork, and delays. This department should be much more responsive to local needs by bringing the Federal Government into closer contact with State and local education agencies. One Federal Department to administer this Nation's education programs should provide better leadership and management. Education will receive the increased status and visibility it deserves. And our commitment to providing this country with the best possible education opportunities will be strengthened.●

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am proud to be a cosponsor of the legislation to create a separate Department of Education. As an original cosponsor of the similar bill which passed the Senate during the 95th Congress, I am pleased to sign my name to the measure which is introduced today.

One of the hallmarks of our 96th Congress will be the emphasis placed on our responsibilities for oversight of the Federal agencies and their programs. In the field of education, our ability to carry out this mission will be considerably enhanced by the creation of a single department to administer programs for education which are now scattered among several Federal agencies.

Current Federal expenditures for education can be more effectively monitored by Congress if they are administered by a single department. We can also hold a Secretary for Education who sits in the President's Cabinet fully accountable for efficiently running the agency.

Roughly $9.5 billion was spent by the Education Division of HEW in 1978. This amount is larger than the budgets for the Departments of Commerce, Interior, Justice, and State. Yet the agency responsible for administering the funds for education is buried within the bureaucracy of a large department which must run other important programs.

Congress is committed to meeting its mandate to see that existing Federal programs are administered wisely and without undue restrictions. The creation of a Department of Education to more effectively and efficiently administer Federal programs for education can help Congress to meet its oversight responsibilities. It is my hope that the Department of Education will become a reality in 1979.

overseas military dependents run by the Defense Department, and some science education programs of the National Science Foundation.

Education officials have done their best to meet the educational needs of many Americans. However, without a Cabinet secretary reporting directly to the President on our critical educational needs and the status of education programs, there will never be a coordinated national policy to meet our basic needs. With the demands made on one Cabinet secretary who has responsibility for three major agencies, Health, Education, and Welfare, it is no wonder the focus on education has weakened. Our Nation cannot afford this. There are many problems which require the attention of a Secretary whose sole responsibility is education and who has the authority to make major policies and see to it that these policies are implemented. There is much evidence that we need strong direction: Approximately one-fourth of our children in grade school will not earn a high school diploma; an estimated 30 million teenagers and adults in this country are functionally illiterate; hundreds and perhaps thousands of young children are exposed to cancer-causing asbestos materials in their classrooms, and many students refuse to repay the student loan they borrowed from the Federal Government—resulting in the loss of millions of taxpayer dollars. These are just a few of our many problems. Furthermore, the complicated regulations, and endless paperwork required are the result of education programs being scattered through-

Mr. President, I understand that the Congressional Budget Office is preparing its cost estimate of the Department of Education bill. Until we have that estimate, we will not know if the department as envisioned in this bill will cost the taxpayers any additional money.

I want to state my strong feeling that my support for this bill is based on its potential to give higher priority and better management to Federal education programs. I do not support a new bureaucracy which would require additional funding for administrative and bureaucratic costs at the expense of our Nation's educational needs and at the expense of our commitment to fiscal restraint.

I will pursue these potential costs and benefits when the Committee on Governmental Affairs begins hearings on this legislation next week.●

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the Department of Education bill. It is unfortunate that this bill must again make its way through the legislative process, as a version of this bill should have been passed in the 95th session of Congress. Instead, the Department of Education bill was once again pushed aside—perhaps the most blatant evidence of all that education in its present structure exerts little influence.

This bill would transfer to the new Education Department the Education Division of Health, Education, and Welfare, vocational rehabilitation programs of HEW, parts of the HEW Office of Civil Rights relating to education, schools for out 40 different agencies. Placing these programs under one roof would save the policymaker time, and the taxpayer money.

It should be stated that it is not the purpose of a separate Department of Education to supersede State and local control of education. However, coordination between State and local educational agencies and the Federal Government is needed if Federal education programs are to be effective. The required redtape and regulations as well as the lack of organization and communication have alienated the State and local agencies and have resulted in inadequate education programs for children.

All of these problems will not be solved simply by moving various education divisions to one building. Sincere efforts must be made on the part of the President of the United States, the Secretary of Education, Federal, State, and local officials, and concerned citizens, to see that better educational policies are established, implemented, and consistently evaluated. By creating a Department of Education, this much-needed framework is set—the rest is up to us.●

96TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. 210

To establish a Department of Education.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) education is fundamental to the growth and achievement of the Nation;

(2) there is a continual need to provide equal access to education for all Americans;

(3) the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with State, local, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities, and families;

(4) in our Federal system, the primary responsibility for education is reserved respectively to the States and to their diverse instrumentalities;

(5) the dispersion of education programs across a large number of Federal agencies has led to fragmented, duplicative, and often inconsistent Federal policies relating to education;

(6) there is a lack of coordination of Federal resources for State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions;

(7) Presidential and public consideration of issues relating to education is hindered by the present organizational position of education programs in the executive branch of the Government;

(8) the importance of education is increasing as new technologies and alternative approaches to traditional education are considered, as society becomes more complex, and as equal opportunities in education and employment are promoted; and

(9) therefore, it is in the public interest and general welfare of the United States to establish a Department of Education.

PURPOSES

SEC. 102. It is the purpose of this Act to establish a Department of Education in order to—

(1) enable education to receive the appropriate emphasis at the Federal level;

(2) continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities;

(3) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents, and students to improve the quality of education, while acknowledging the right of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions to formulate policies, choose curricula, decide administrative questions, determine their own methods for raising revenues, and choose program content with respect to their educational programs;

(4) encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the decisionmaking process relating to education, including the development and improvement of education programs and services;

(5) enable the Federal Government to coordinate education activities and programs more effectively through interagency cooperation, technical assistance, and evaluation of program effectiveness;

(6)(A) provide assistance in the support of basic and applied educational research; (B) collect and analyze information on the progress and condition of education in the United States; and (C) work with State, local, and tribal officials, public and nonpublic educational institutions, community organizations, parents, and students to implement the findings of such research at the local level; and

(7) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, tribal, and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated educational needs of such agencies, especially with respect to the simplification of the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, as well as the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens and constraints, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds.

STATE AND LOCAL RESPONSIBILITIES FOR EDUCATION

SEC. 103. It is the intention of the Congress in the creation of the Department of Education to protect the rights of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, competency testing, and selection of curricula and program content, and to strengthen and improve the direction of such governments and institutions over their educational programs and policies.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 104. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "Department" means the Department of Education or any component thereof;

(2) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education;

(3) the term "Under Secretary" means the Under Secretary of Education;

(4) the term "Assistant Secretary" means an Assistant Secretary of Education;

(5) the term "Director" means the Director of the Office for Civil Rights;

(6) the term "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Office of Education for Overseas Dependents;

(7) the term "Council" means the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education;

(8) the term "Committee" means the Federal Interagency Committee on Education; and

(9) the term "function" includes any duty, obligation, power, authority, responsibility, right, privilege, and activity.

TITLE II—ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

SEC. 201. There is established as an executive department of the Government, the Department of Education.

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS

SEC. 202. (a) The Department shall be administered by a Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level I of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5312 of title 5, United States Code.

(b)(1) There shall be in the Department an Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Under Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level III of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5314, United States Code.

(2) The Secretary shall designate the order in which other officials of the Department shall act for and perform the functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of both the Secretary and Under Secretary or in the event of vacancies in both of those offices.

(c)(1) There shall be in the Department—

(A) an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services;

(B) an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education;

(C) an Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education;

(D) an Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education;

(E) an Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement;

(F) a Director of the Office for Civil Rights;

(G) two additional Assistant Secretaries;

(H) a General Counsel; and

(I) an Inspector General.

(2) Each of the Assistant Secretaries, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the General Counsel, and the Inspector General shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the General Counsel, and the Inspector General shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the General Counsel, and the Inspector General shall report directly to the Secretary and shall be compensated at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

(d) One of the Assistant Secretaries appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1)(G) shall administer the functions of the Department under section 203(7) and shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe. One of the Assistant Secretaries appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1)(G) shall administer the functions of the Department under section 203(11) and shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

(e) There shall be in the Department an Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents. The Administrator shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. The Administrator shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

(f) There shall be in the Department one additional officer who shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. Such officer shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

(g) Whenever the President submits the name of an individual to the Senate for confirmation as an officer of the Department under subsections (c) and (d), the President shall state the particular functions of the Department such individual will exercise upon taking office.

FUNCTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 203. The functions of the Department shall be to promote the cause and advancement of education throughout the United States and shall include—

(1) administration of programs pertaining to elementary and secondary education;

(2) administration of programs pertaining to postsecondary education;

(3) administration of programs pertaining to occupational, adult, and community education;

(4) administration of education grants and other programs for which the Department has responsibility under law;

(5) administration of programs relating to special education and rehabilitative services;

(6) enforcement of the civil rights laws relating to education;

(7) intergovernmental policies and relations, including responsibility for assuring that Federal education policies and procedures supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, and parents to improve their educational programs;

(8) administration of schools for the overseas dependents of personnel of the Department of Defense;

(9) research, dissemination of improved educational practices, and the coordinated collection and dissemination of statistics;

(10) public information;

(11) planning and evaluation of the programs of the Department, and development of policies to promote the efficient and coordinated administration of the Department and the programs of the Department and to encourage improvement in education;

(12) congressional relations, including responsibility for providing a continuing liaison between the Department and the Congress;

(13) administration and management of the Department, including responsibility for legal assistance, accounting, personnel, payroll, budgeting, and other administrative functions; and

(14) monitoring parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required by law, and encouraging the involvement of parents, students, and the public in the development and implementation of departmental programs.

OFFICE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS

SEC. 204. (a) There is established in the Department an Office for Civil Rights, to be administered by the Director of the Office for Civil Rights appointed under section 202(c). The Secretary shall delegate to the Director of the Office for Civil Rights all functions of the Office for Civil Rights of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to education transferred under section 301(b)(2)(C) (other than administrative and support functions). The Director shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

(b) Each year, the Director shall prepare and transmit a report directly to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress concerning the status of compliance with the civil rights laws relating to education. The report shall include a statement concerning the plans and recommendations of the Director to insure improved enforcement of and continued compliance with the civil rights laws relating to education.

OFFICE OF ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

SEC. 205. There is established in the Department an Office of Elementary and Secondary Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education appointed under section 202(c). The Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE OF POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION

SEC. 206. There is established in the Department an Office of Postsecondary Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education appointed under section 202(c). The Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE OF OCCUPATIONAL, ADULT, AND COMMUNITY EDUCATION

SEC. 207. There is established in the Department an Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education appointed under section 202(c). The Secretary shall delegate to the Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education the functions of the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education transferred under section 301(b)(1)(A) (other than administrative and support functions). The Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE OF SPECIAL EDUCATION AND REHABILITATIVE SERVICES

SEC. 208. (a) There shall be in the Department an Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary of Education for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services appointed under section 202(c). The Secretary shall delegate to the Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services all functions transferred to the Secretary under sections 301(b)(2)(A)(x) (including the functions of the Bureau for the education and training of the handicapped), 301(b)(2)(G), and 301(b)(3), relating to the Education of the Handicapped Act, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Randolph-Sheppard Act (other than administrative and support functions). The Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

(b) Nothing in this section shall be construed to require any particular organizational structure of vocational rehabilitation programs at the State level.

OFFICE OF EDUCATION FOR OVERSEAS DEPENDENTS

SEC. 209. There is established in the Department an Office of Education for Overseas Dependents, to be administered by the Administrator appointed under section 202(e). The Secretary shall delegate to the Administrator all functions transferred from the Department of Defense under section 302, relating to the Office of Dependents Schools of the Department of Defense (and after June 30, 1979, relating to the Office of Dependents' Education of the Department of Defense) and to the operation of overseas schools for dependent children of members of the Armed Forces (other than administrative and support functions). The Administrator shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE OF EDUCATIONAL RESEARCH AND IMPROVEMENT

SEC. 210. (a) There is established in the Department an Office of Educational Research and Improvement, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement appointed under section 202(c). The Secretary shall delegate to the Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement—

(1) all functions transferred from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare—

(A) under section 301(b)(2)(A)(i), relating to the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education; and

(B) under section 301(b)(2)(E), relating to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations; and

(2) all programs transferred from the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation under section 303.

(b) The Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL

SEC. 211. There is established in the Department an Office of General Counsel, to be administered by the General Counsel appointed under section 202(c). The General Counsel shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe, and shall provide legal assistance to the Secretary concerning the programs and policies of the Department.

OFFICE OF INSPECTOR GENERAL

SEC. 212. (a) There is established in the Department an Inspector General, to be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Inspector General Act of 1978.

(b) The Inspector General Act of 1978 is amended—

(1) by inserting in section 2(1) "the Department of Education," immediately after "Commerc[illegible]

(2) in section 9(a)(1)—

(A) by redesignating subparagraphs (C) through (L) as (D) through (M), respectively; and

(B) by inserting immediately after subparagraph (B) the following new subparagraph:

"(C) of the Department of Education, all functions of the Inspector General of Health, Education, and Welfare or of the Office of Inspector General of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to functions transferred by section 301 of the Department of Education Organization Act;";

(3) by inserting in section 11(1) "Education," immediately after "Commerce,"; and

(4) by inserting in section 11(2) "Education," immediately after "Commerce,".

(c) The title of the Inspector General Act of 1978 is amended to read as follows: "An Act to reorganize the executive branch of the Government and increase its economy and efficiency by establishing Offices of Inspector General within the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Education, Housing and Urban Development, the Interior, Labor, and Transportation, and within the Community Services Administration, the Environmental Protection Agency, the General Services Administration, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Small Business Administration, and the Veterans' Administration, and for other purposes.".

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

SEC. 213. (a) There is established within the Department an advisory committee to be known as the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council shall provide assistance and make recommendations to the Secretary and the President concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education.

(b)(1) In carrying out its functions under subsection (a), the Council shall—

(A) provide a forum for the development of intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education;

(B) make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs and education-related programs;

(C) promote better intergovernmental relations;

(D) assess Federal policies and make recommendations to insure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions;

(E) submit a report biannually to the Congress, to the President, and to the Secretary which—

(i) reviews the impact of Federal education policies upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions; and

(ii) assesses the achievement of Federal objectives in education as well as any adverse consequences of Federal actions upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions; and

(F) assist the Secretary in conducting conferences and similar activities to assess the contribution of each level of government to the delivery of equitable, high quality, and effective education.

(2) In carrying out its functions under subsection (a), the Council may review existing and proposed rules or regulations of the Department concerning Federal education programs in order to determine the impact or potential impact of such rules or regulations on State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

(c)(1) The Council shall be composed of twenty-two members. The President shall appoint—

(A) eight members from among State governors, legislators, boards of education (both elementary and secondary and postsecondary), and chief education officials (both elementary and secondary and postsecondary);

(B) eight members from among local or regional elected general government officials, local boards of education, public and nonpublic school administrators, and tribal governments;

(C) two members from among governing boards of public and nonpublic postsecondary institutions; and

(D) four members from among the public, including parents, teachers, students, and public interest groups.

(2) In making appointments under this subsection, the President shall consult with various organizations representative of the groups specified in subparagraphs (A) through (D) of paragraph (1), including the National Governors' Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, and the United States Conference of Mayors.

(3) Not more than eleven of the members of the Council may be members of the same political party.

(d)(1) Members of the Council shall be appointed for a term of four years, except that the term of office of the members first appointed shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, five at the end of one year, five at the end of two years, six at the end of three years, and six at the end of four years.

(2) Any member of the Council who is appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1) may serve on the Council beyond the period that such member holds the elective office which served as the basis of the appointment of such member.

(e) The President shall designate one of the members of the Council as the Chair of the Council.

(f) Twelve members of the Council shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may hold hearings. Any vacancy in the Council shall not affect its power to function.

(g)(1) In carrying out the provisions of subsection (b)(2), the Council may provide parties to be affected by existing or proposed rules or regulations an opportunity to comment on such rules or regulations, and shall consider any comments received in reviewing such rules or regulations.

(2) The Council may submit to the Secretary a report containing the results of its review of any existing or proposed rules or regulations. Within thirty days of the receipt of such report, the Secretary shall submit to the Council a written response which addresses the recommendations made by the Council concerning any rules or regulations reviewed. If a report by the Council concerns proposed rules or regulations, it shall be submitted to the Secretary within the time established for public comment on the proposed rules or regulations, and shall be placed, with the written response of the Secretary to the report, on the record of the proceeding concerning the proposed rules or regulations.

(h) Each member of the Council who is not otherwise employed by the United States Government shall receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily rate prescribed for GS-18 under the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime, for each day such member is engaged in the actual performance of duties as a member of the Council. A member of the Council who is an officer or employee of the United States Government shall serve without additional compensation. All members of the Council shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties.

(i) In order to carry out the provisions of this section, the Council is authorized to—

(1) hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, either as a whole or by subcommittee, and request the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents as the Council or such subcommittee may deem advisable; and

(2) request the cooperation and assistance of Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities in carrying out the provisions of this section, and such departments, agencies, and instrumentalities are authorized to provide such cooperation and assistance.

(j) The Secretary shall appoint an executive director for the Council. The executive director shall be compensated at the rate provided for GS-17 of the General Schedule under section 5332, title 5, United States Code. The Secretary shall provide the Council with such other staff, support, facilities, and assistance as may be necessary to enable the Council to carry out its duties under this section.

FEDERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

SEC. 214. (a) There is established a Federal Interagency Committee on Education. The Committee shall assist the Secretary in providing a mechanism to assure that the procedures and actions of the Department and other Federal departments and agencies are fully coordinated.

(b) The Committee shall cooperate with the Secretary in the conduct of studies and shall make recommendations in order to assure the effective coordination of Federal programs affecting education, including—

(1) the consistent administration of policies and practices by Federal agencies in the conduct of similar programs;

(2) full and effective communication among Federal agencies to avoid unnecessary duplication of activities;

(3) adequate procedures to assure the availability of information requested by the Secretary;

(4) the improvement, development, and oversight of a comprehensive Federal policy for education; and

(5) the improvement of the administration and coordination of federally funded vocational education and training programs for the purpose of aiding students and adults in preparing for and achieving success in their worklife.

(c)(1) The Committee shall be composed of at least seventeen members. One member shall be the Secretary, who shall be the Chair of the Committee.

(2)(A) Sixteen members of the Committee shall be representatives of the departments and agencies listed in subparagraph (B), to be appointed by the head of each department and agency from among the senior policymaking officials of that department or agency.

(B) The departments and agencies to be represented on the Committee pursuant to subparagraph (A) are:

(i) Department of Agriculture;

(ii) Department of Commerce;

(iii) Department of Defense;

(iv) Department of Energy;

(v) Department of Justice;

(vi) Department of Health and Human Services;

(vii) Department of the Interior;

(viii) Department of Labor;

(ix) Department of State;

(x) National Aeronautics and Space Administration;

(xi) National Endowment for the Arts;

(xii) National Endowment for the Humanities;

(xiii) National Science Foundation;

(xiv) Veterans' Administration;

(xv) Commission on Civil Rights; and

(xvi) Environmental Protection Agency.

(3) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, and the Executive Director of the Domestic Policy Staff may each designate a member of the staff of such agencies to attend meetings of the Committee as observers.

(4) The Secretary may invite the heads of Federal agencies other than the agencies represented on the Committee under the provisions of paragraph (2) to designate representatives to serve as members of the Committee or to participate in meetings of the Committee concerning matters of substantial interest to such agencies.

(d) In carrying out its functions under subsection (b)(5), the Committee shall conduct a study concerning the need for improved coordination between all federally funded vocational education and training programs. The Committee shall report the findings of such study to the Secretary and the Congress within two years of the date of enactment of this Act.

(e) The Committee shall meet at least twice each year.

(f) The Secretary and the head of each Federal agency represented on the Committee under subsection (c)(2) shall furnish such assistance, support, facilities and staff to the Committee as may be necessary to enable the Committee to carry out its functions under this section.

TITLE III—TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS

TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

SEC. 301. (a) All officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, grants, property, and records as are determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any function of the following agencies, offices or parts of agencies or offices, are transferred to the Department and vested in the Secretary:

(1) the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the National Institute of Education; orders relating to the functions transferred by other subsections of this section and the other sections of this title;

(D) with respect to all laws dealing with the relationship between (i) Gallaudet College (including the Model Secondary School for the Deaf), Howard University, the American Printing House for the Blind, and the National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and (ii) the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(E) under subpart A of part IV of title III of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations;

(F) under subparts II and III of part B of title VIII of the Public Health Service Act, relating to the establishment of student loan funds and scholarship grant programs for schools of nursing and under subparts I and II of part C of title VII of such Act, relating to the establishment of student loan insurance and student loan funds for schools of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, pharmacy, podiatry, optometry, or veterinary medicine; and

(G)(i) under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, except that the provisions of this subdivision shall not be construed to transfer to the Secretary the functions of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under sections 222 and 1615 of the Social Security Act, relating to rehabilitation services for disabled individuals and rehabilitation services for blind and disabled individuals respectively; and

(ii) with respect to or being administered by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare through the Commissioner of Rehabilitation Services under the Act entitled "An Act to authorize the operation of stands in Federal buildings by blind persons, to enlarge the economic opportunities of the blind, and for other purposes", approved June 20, 1936 (commonly referred to as the Randolph-Sheppard Act) (20 U.S.C. 107–107f).

(3) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Commissioner of Rehabilitation of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

(4) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the National Institute of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(5) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Director of the Institute of Museum Services of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(6) Nothing in the provisions of this section or in the provisions of this Act shall authorize the transfer of functions under part A of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, relating to Project Head Start, from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to the Secretary.

TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

SEC. 302. (a)(1) There are transferred to the Department all officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, and records as are determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any function of the Office of Dependents Schools of the Department of Defense (and, after June 30, 1979, of the Office of Dependents' Education of the Department of Defense).

(2) There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Secretary of Defense relating to the operation of overseas schools for dependents of personnel of the Department of Defense (and, after June 30, 1979, all functions of the Secretary of Defense and the Director of Dependents' Education under the Defense Dependents' Education Act of 1978).

(b) In addition to any other authority available to the Secretary under this or any other Act, the authority of the Secretary of Defense and the Secretaries of the military departments under the Defense Department Overseas Teachers Pay and Personnel Practices Act shall be available to the Secretary with respect to the program transferred under subsection (a).

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 601, the transfer of functions under subsection (a) shall be effective at such time or times and in such manner as the President shall prescribe, but in no case later than three years after the effective date of this Act. Not later than one year after the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall transmit to the Congress a plan for effecting the transfers of functions under subsection (a). Such plan shall contain recommendations for increasing the participation of parents, teachers, students, school administrators, and members of the Armed Forces in the administration and operation of the schools transferred under this section.

TRANSFERS OF FUNCTIONS FROM THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

SEC. 303. (a) There are transferred to the Secretary all programs relating to science education of the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation under section 3(a)(1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950 established on the day before the effective date of this Act, except the functions and programs, as determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, which relate to (1) fellowships and traineeships integral to the support of scientific research and development, (2) ethical, value, and science policy issues, or (3) communicating science information to nonscientists.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to conduct the programs transferred by subsection (a). In conducting such programs, the Secretary shall consult, as appropriate, with the Director of the National Science Foundation.

(c) Nothing in this section is intended to repeal or limit the authority of the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation to initiate and conduct programs not established prior to the effective date of this Act under section 3(a)(1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950.

TRANSFERS OF PROGRAMS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

SEC. 304. There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Attorney General and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration relating to the student loan and grant programs known as the Law Enforcement and Education Program and the Law Enforcement Intern Program authorized under section 406 (b), (c), and (f) of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968.

TRANSFERS OF FUNCTIONS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 305. There are transferred to the Secretary all functions of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development under title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 relating to college housing loans.

TRANSFER OF THE ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION STATISTICS

SEC. 306. There are transferred to the Department all officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, and records as are determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any function of the Advisory Council on Education Statistics.

EFFECT OF TRANSFERS

SEC. 307. The transfer of a function or program from an officer or agency to the Secretary shall include the transfer of any aspect of such function or program vested in a subordinate of such officer or in a component of such agency.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

PART A—PERSONNEL PROVISIONS

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

SEC. 401. (a) The Secretary is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, including attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Secretary and the Department. Except as otherwise provided by law, such officers and employees shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and compensated in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title.

(b)(1) Subject to the provisions of chapter 51 of title 5, United States Code, but notwithstanding the last two sentences of section 5108(a) of such title, the Secretary may place in grades GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18 all positions in such grades assigned and employed on February 1, 1979, in connection with functions transferred under this Act, subject to the limitation of the first sentence of section 5108(a) of such title.

(2) Appointments under this subsection may be made without regard to the provisions of section 3324 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the approval by the Office of Personnel Management of appointments in grades GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18, if the individual placed in such position is transferred to the Department in connection with a transfer of functions under this Act and, immediately before the effective date of this Act, held a position involving duties comparable to those of such position.

(3) The authority of the Secretary under this subsection to appoint personnel without regard to sections 3324 and 5108(a) of title 5, United States Code, shall cease with respect to any position when the person first appointed to fill such position no longer holds such position.

(c)(1) In addition to the number of positions which may be placed at the GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18 levels under section 5108 of title 5, United States Code, under existing law, or under this Act, the Secretary may appoint—

(A) for the Office of Educational Research and Improvement, professional and technical employees, in a number not to exceed one-third of the total number of employees of such office; and

(B) not more than 15 transitional employees;

without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and may fix the compensation of such personnel without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter 53 of such title, except the Secretary may not compensate any such personnel in excess of the maximum rate prescribed for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) The authority of the Secretary to appoint and compensate personnel under paragraph (1)(B) shall expire three years after the effective date of this Act.

(d)(1) There are authorized for the Department seventy-one additional positions in the competitive service at levels

GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18. Such positions shall be for the exclusive use of the Department and shall be in addition to the number of such positions placed in the appropriate grades under section 5108 of title 5, United States Code, or under other provisions of law.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to assign twenty-one of the positions authorized under this subsection to replace, at their former General Schedule levels, the twenty-one positions previously established by law in the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, except that the Secretary may from time to time evaluate the propriety of the General Schedule level of each such position and make any necessary reductions in such grade level.

(3) For purposes of determining the maximum aggregate number of positions which may be placed at grade levels GS-16, GS-17, or GS-18 under section 5108(a) of title 5, United States Code, of the positions established under this subsection, other than those used to replace positions previously established by law in the Education Division, 63 percent shall be deemed GS-16 positions, 25 percent shall be deemed GS-17 positions, and 12 percent shall be deemed GS-18 positions.

(e) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the application of any Indian preference law in effect on the day before the date of enactment of this Act to any function transferred by this Act and subject to any such law on the day before the date of enactment of this Act. Any function transferred by this Act and subject to any such law shall continue to be subject to any such law.

(b)(1)(A) The Secretary is authorized to accept voluntary and uncompensated services without regard to the provisions of section 3679(b) of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 665(b)): Provided, That such services will not be used to displace Federal employees employed on a full-time, part-time, or seasonal basis.

(B) The Secretary is authorized to accept volunteer service in accordance with the provisions of section 3111 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to provide for incidental expenses, including but not limited to transportation, lodging, and subsistence for such volunteers.

(3) An individual who provides voluntary services under paragraph (1)(A) of this subsection shall not be considered a Federal employee for any purpose other than for purposes of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, relating to compensation for work injuries, and of chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code, relating to tort claims.

EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS

SEC. 402. The Secretary may obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, and may compensate such experts and consultants at rates not to exceed the daily rate prescribed for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title.

ANNUAL AUTHORIZATION OF PERSONNEL

SEC. 403. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act—

(1) Congress shall authorize the end strength as of the end of each fiscal year for personnel for the Department. Except as provided in subsection (b)(1) for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1979, and ending September 30, 1980, Congress shall authorize the end strength for any fiscal year by prescribing the maximum number of personnel that may be employed by the Department on the last day of such fiscal year. No funds may be appropriated for any fiscal year to or for the use of personnel of the Department unless the end strength for personnel of the Department for that fiscal year has been authorized by law.

(2) The end strength for personnel authorized by law for the Department for any fiscal year shall be apportioned among the offices and agencies of the Department in such numbers as the Secretary shall prescribe. Except as provided in subsection (b)(2), the Secretary shall, within one hundred and twenty days after the enactment of legislation authorizing the end strength for personnel of the Department for any fiscal year, prepare and transmit to the Congress a report showing the allocation of such personnel among the offices and agencies of the Department. Such report shall include explanations and justifications for the allocations of personnel made by the Secretary among the offices and agencies of the Department.

(3) In computing the authorized end strength for personnel of the Department for any fiscal year, there shall be included all direct-hire and indirect-hire personnel employed to perform functions of the Department whether employed on a full-time, part-time, or intermittent basis, but excluding special employment categories for students and disadvantaged youth, including temporary summer employment.

(4) Whenever any function, power, duty, or activity is transferred or assigned in any fiscal year after the effective date of this Act to the Department from a department or agency outside of the Department, the end strength for personnel authorized for the Department for such fiscal year shall be adjusted to reflect any increases or decreases in personnel required as a result of such transfer or assignment.

(b)(1) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1979, and ending September 30, 1980, the Department is authorized an end strength for personnel equal to the sum of (A) the number of personnel to be employed by the Department under the authorizations provided by other sections of this Act, and (B) the number of personnel transferred, under authority of this Act, to the Department from other departments and agencies of the Government during such fiscal year, as determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget. If the Secretary determines such action is necessary for the effective administration of the Department, the Secretary may employ additional personnel during such fiscal year in excess of the number authorized under the preceding sentence, but the number of such additional personnel may not exceed 1 per centum of the number authorized under the preceding sentence.

(2) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Secretary shall prepare and transmit the report required by subsection (a)(2) within one hundred and twenty days after the effective date of this Act.

PART B—GENERAL PROVISIONS

AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY

SEC. 411. In the exercise of the functions transferred under this Act, the Secretary shall have the same authority as the functions of the agency or office, or any part thereof, exercising such functions immediately preceding their transfer, and the actions of the Secretary in exercising such functions shall have the same force and effect as when exercised by such agency or office, or part thereof.

DELEGATION

SEC. 412. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the Secretary may delegate any function to such officers and employees of the Department as the Secretary may designate, and may authorize such successive redelegations of such functions within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate. No delegation of functions by the Secretary under this section or under any other provision of this Act shall not relieve the Secretary of responsibility for the administration of such functions.

REORGANIZATION

SEC. 413. (a) Subject to the provisions of section 202(g) of this Act and subsections (b) and (c) of this section, the Secretary is authorized to allocate or reallocate functions among the officers of the Department, and to establish, consolidate, alter, or discontinue such organizational entities within the Department as may be necessary or appropriate. The authority of the Secretary under this subsection does not extend to—

(1) any office, bureau, unit, or other entity within the Department established by statute or any function vested by statute in such an entity or officer of such an entity;

(2) the abolition of organizational entities established by this Act; or

(3) the alteration of the delegation of functions under this Act to any specific organizational entity.

(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Secretary may not consolidate, alter, or discontinue any of the following statutory entities, or reallocate any functions vested by statute in the following statutory entities:

(A) Office of Bilingual Education;

(B) Teacher Corps;

(C) Community College Unit;

(D) National Center for Education Statistics;

(E) National Institute of Education;

(F) Office of Environmental Education;

(G) Office of Consumers' Education;

(H) Office of Libraries and Learning Resources;

(I) Office of Indian Education;

(J) Office of Non-Public Education;

(K) Institute of Museum Services; and

(L) Administrative units for guidance and counseling programs, the veterans' cost of instruction program, and the program for the gifted and talented children.

(2) The Secretary may not alter, consolidate, or discontinue any organizational entity continued within the Department and described in paragraph (1) of this subsection or reallocate any function vested by statute in such an entity, unless a period of ninety days has passed after the receipt by the Committee on Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives of notice given by the Secretary containing a full and complete statement of the action proposed to be taken pursuant to this subsection and the facts and circumstances relied upon in support of such proposed action.

(c) On the effective date of this Act, the following entities shall lapse:

(1) the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including the Office of Education;

(2) the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(3) the Bureau for the Education and Training for the Handicapped of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(4) the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; and

(5) the Office of Dependents' Education of the Department of Defense.

REPORTING RELATIONSHIPS

SEC. 414. (a) Consistent with the provisions of section 413, and notwithstanding the provisions of the General Education Provisions Act or of any other Act, any officer or employee of the Department whose functions were transferred by this Act and who was required prior to the effective date of this Act to report to the Commissioner of Education or the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare shall report to the Secretary.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to delegate the reporting requirements established by subsection (a) to any other officer or employee of the Department.

RULES

SEC. 415. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe, in accordance with the provisions of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code, such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the functions of the Secretary or the Department.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 416. (a) The Secretary is authorized to enter into and perform such contracts, grants, leases, cooperative agreements, or other similar transactions with the Federal departments and agencies, public agencies, State, local, and tribal governments, private organizations, and individuals, and to make such payments, by way of advance or reimbursement, as the Secretary may deem necessary or appropriate to carry out his functions in administering the Department.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no authority to enter into contracts or to make payments under this title shall be effective except to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance under appropriation Acts. This subsection shall not apply with respect to the authority granted under section 423.

TECHNICAL ADVICE

SEC. 417. The Secretary is authorized to provide advice, counsel, and technical assistance to applicants, potential applicants, and other interested persons with respect to any program or function of the Secretary or the Department. The Secretary shall, upon request, provide technical assistance to any State desiring to develop comprehensive plans applicable to two or more programs administered by the Department.

REGIONAL AND FIELD OFFICES

SEC. 418. The Secretary is authorized to establish, maintain, alter, or discontinue such regional or other field offices as may be necessary or appropriate to perform the functions of the Secretary or the Department.

ACQUISITION AND MAINTENANCE OF PROPERTY

SEC. 419. (a) The Secretary is authorized to—

(1) acquire (by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise), construct, improve, repair, operate, and maintain schools and related facilities, laboratories, research and testing sites and facilities, quarters and related accommodations for employees and dependents of employees of the Department, personal property (including patents), or any interest therein, as may be necessary; and

(2) provide by contract or otherwise for the establishment of eating facilities and other necessary facilities for the health and welfare of employees of the Department at its installations, and purchase and maintain equipment therefor.

(b) The authority available to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under section 524 of the Education Amendments of 1976 shall also be available to the Secretary.

(c) The authority granted by subsection (a) of this section shall be available only with respect to facilities of a special purpose nature that cannot readily be reassigned for similar Federal activities and are not otherwise available for assignment to the Department by the Administrator of General Services.

FACILITIES AT REMOTE LOCATIONS

SEC. 420. (a) The Secretary is authorized to provide, construct, or maintain for employees and their dependents stationed at remote locations as necessary and when not otherwise available at such remote locations—

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) dining facilities;

(4) audiovisual equipment, accessories, and supplies for recreation and training;

(5) reimbursement for food, clothing, medicine, and other supplies furnished by such employees in emergencies for the temporary relief of distressed persons;

(6) living and working quarters and facilities; and

(7) transportation for dependents of employees of the Department to the nearest appropriate educational facilities.

(b) The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of the cost of such work or services or to refund excess sums when necessary.

USE OF FACILITIES

SEC. 421. (a)(1) To carry out the functions of the Secretary, the Secretary may use the research, equipment, services, and facilities of any agency or instrumentality of the United States or of any State, or of any political subdivision thereof, or of any Indian tribe or tribal organization, or of any foreign government, with the consent of and with or without reimbursement to such agency, instrumentality, State, political subdivision, Indian tribe or tribal organization, or foreign government.

(2) Notwithstanding the transfer of functions from the Secretary of Defense to the Secretary under section 304, all personnel performing such functions shall be treated, for the purpose of access to services and facilities provided by the Department of Defense, as employees of the Department of Defense.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to permit public and private agencies, corporations, associations, Indian tribes or tribal organizations, other organizations, or individuals to use any real property, or any facilities, structures, or other improvement thereon, under the custody and control of the Secretary for Department purposes. The Secretary shall permit the use of such property, facilities, structures, or improvements under such terms and rates and for such period as may be in the public interest, except that the periods of such uses may not exceed five years. The Secretary may require permittees under this section to recondition and maintain, at their own expense, the real property, facilities, structures, and improvements used by such permittees to a standard satisfactory to the Secretary. This subsection shall not apply to excess property as defined in section 3(e) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (40 U.S.C. 472(e)).

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriation of funds that bear or will bear all or part of such cost of the equipment or facilities provided or to refund excess sums when necessary.

COPYRIGHTS AND PATENTS

SEC. 422. The Secretary is authorized to acquire any of the following described rights if the property acquired thereby is for use by or for, or useful to, the Department:

(1) copyrights, patents, and applications for patents, designs, processes, and manufacturing data;

(2) licenses under copyrights, patents, and applications for patents; and

(3) releases, before suit is brought, for past infringement of patents or copyrights.

GIFTS AND BEQUESTS

SEC. 423. The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts, bequests and devises of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts, bequests, and devises of money and proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts, bequests, or devises shall be deposited in the Treasury in a separate fund and shall be disbursed upon the order of the Secretary. Property accepted pursuant to this section, and the proceeds thereof, shall be used as nearly as possible in accordance with the terms of the gift, bequest, or devise donating such property. For the purposes of Federal income, estate, and gift taxes, property accepted under this section shall be considered as a gift, bequest, or devise to the United States.

WORKING CAPITAL FUND

SEC. 424. The Secretary is authorized to establish a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interests of economy and efficiency, including such services as a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its components; central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services; office space, central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and a central library service. The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing capital (which appropriations are authorized) and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less the related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such funds shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of components of the Department, or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates which will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payments for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus found in the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses considered) above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund. There shall be transferred to the fund the stocks of supplies, equipment, other assets, liabilities, and unpaid obligations relating to the services which the Secretary determines will be performed through the fund.

FUNDS TRANSFER

SEC. 425. The Secretary may, when authorized in an appropriation Act in any fiscal year, transfer funds from one appropriation to another within the Department, except that no appropriation for any fiscal year shall be either increased or decreased pursuant to this section by more than 5 per centum and no such transfer shall result in increasing any such appropriation above the amount authorized to be appropriated therefor.

SEAL OF THE DEPARTMENT

SEC. 426. The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department of such design as the Secretary shall approve. Judicial notice shall be taken of such seal.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 427. (a) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year, prepare and transmit a report to the President for transmission to the Congress concerning the activities of the Department during that fiscal year. Such report shall—

(1) include a statement of the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department which are consistent with the purposes of the Department as specified in section 102 and the findings of this Act as specified in section 101;

(2) contain an assessment of the progress made during that fiscal year and anticipated future progress toward the attainment of—

(A) the goals, priorities, and plans for the Department specified pursuant to paragraph (1);

(B) the effective and efficient management of the Department; and

(C) the coordination of the functions of the Department;

(3) contain and analyze objective data concerning—

(A) changing trends in education, as measured by indicators such as enrollments, expenditures, and numbers of teachers and other categories of professional and related personnel; and

(B) areas of critical concern such as education of the disadvantaged and education in rural and urban areas;

(4) include budget projections for the five fiscal years succeeding the fiscal year for which the report is made which are based on actual or anticipated appropriations for the fiscal year for which the report is made; and

(5) contain a separate section on the recommendations made by the Federal Interagency Committee on Education regarding the improvement of the coordination and development of Federal education programs.

(b)(1) In preparing and developing the report required by subsection (a), the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consult with members of the public, including representatives of parents, students, educators, Indian tribes, State and local governments, and other organizations and individuals. Within ninety days after the transmission of such report to the Congress, the Secretary shall hold public hearings in the District of Columbia and in such other locations as the Secretary deems appropriate to maximize public participation.

(2) The Secretary may reimburse any person for expenses reasonably incurred in the course of consultation or hearings under paragraph (1) if such person—

(A) has made or is likely to make a material contribution to the work of the Department; and

(B) could not otherwise participate fully and effectively in such consultation.

(3) For purposes of this section, the term "person" shall have the same meaning as in section 551(2) of title 5, United States Code.

STUDY OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF FEDERAL INDIAN EDUCATION PROGRAMS

SEC. 428. (a) The Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall jointly conduct a comprehensive study on the administration of Indian education programs by the Federal Government. In conducting the study, the Secretaries and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall consult with Indians, Alaskan Natives, Aleuts, affected Indian tribes, and Indian organizations.

(b) The study required by this section shall contain—

(1) an analysis of the problems in the Federal administration of Indian education programs;

(2) recommendations for administrative and programmatic improvements in such programs; and

(3) recommendations concerning the proper organizational structure for Indian education programs within the Federal Government, including an analysis concerning the consolidation of Indian education programs and the transfer of such programs to the Department of Education.

(c) The study required by this section shall be transmitted to the Congress and the President not later than six months after the date of enactment of this Act.

RELATIONSHIP TO GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS ACT

SEC. 429. Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the General Education Provisions Act shall apply to functions transferred by this Act to the extent applicable immediately prior to the effective date of this Act.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 430. Subject to any limitation on appropriations applicable with respect to any function transferred to the Secretary, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and to enable the Secretary to administer and manage the Department. Funds appropriated in accordance with this section shall remain available until expended.

TITLE V—TRANSITIONAL, SAVINGS, AND CONFORMING PROVISIONS

TRANSFER AND ALLOCATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS AND PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the personnel employed in connection with, and the assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available to or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, subject to section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, are transferred to the Secretary for appropriate allocation. Unexpended funds transferred pursuant to this subsection shall be used only for the purposes for which the funds were originally authorized and appropriated.

(b) Positions expressly specified by statute or reorganization plan to carry out functions transferred by this Act, personnel occupying those positions on the effective date of this Act, and personnel authorized to receive compensation in such positions at the rate prescribed for offices and positions at level I, II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5312 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, on the effective date of this Act, shall be subject to the provisions of section 503.

EFFECT ON PERSONNEL

SEC. 502. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the transfer pursuant to this title of full-time personnel (except special Government employees) and part-time personnel holding permanent positions shall not cause any such employee to be separated or reduced in grade or compensation for one year after such transfer or after the effective date of this Act, whichever is later.

(b) Any person who, on the day before the effective date of this Act, held a position compensated in accordance with the Executive Schedule prescribed in chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, and who, without a break in service, is appointed in the Department to a position having duties comparable to the duties performed immediately preceding such appointment shall continue to be compensated in such new position at not less than the rate provided for such previous position for the duration of the service of such person in such new position.

AGENCY TERMINATIONS

SEC. 503. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, whenever all of the functions of any agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, have been terminated or transferred by this Act from that agency, commission, or other body, or component thereof, such agency, commission, or other body, or component, shall terminate. If an agency, commission, or other body, or any component thereof, terminates pursuant to the provisions of the preceding sentence, each position and office therein which was expressly authorized by law, or the incumbent of which was authorized to receive compensation at the rates prescribed for an office or position at level II, III, IV, or V of the Executive Schedule contained in sections 5313 through 5316 of title 5, United States Code, shall terminate.

INCIDENTAL TRANSFERS

SEC. 504. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, at such time or times as such Director shall provide, is authorized and directed to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the transfer of functions which relate to or are utilized by an officer, agency, commission or other body, or component thereof, affected by this Act, and to make such additional incidental dispositions of personnel, assets, liabilities, grants, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred by this Act, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for the termination of the affairs of all agencies, commissions, offices, and other bodies terminated by this Act and for such further measures and dispositions as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 505. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, grants, contracts, certificates, licenses, and privileges—

(1) which have been issued, made, granted, or allowed to become effective by the President, any Federal department or agency or official thereof, or by a court of competent jurisdiction, in the performance of functions which are transferred under this Act to the Department or the Secretary, and shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or revoked in accordance with the law by the President, the Secretary, or other authorized official, a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(2) which are in effect at the time this Act takes effect,

(b)(1) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceedings, including notices of proposed rulemaking, or any application for any license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance pending on the effective date of this Act before any department, agency, commission, or component thereof, functions of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings and applications, to the extent that they relate to functions so transferred, shall be continued. Orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or revoked by the Secretary, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to prohibit the discontinuance or modification of any such proceeding under the same terms and conditions and to the same extent that such proceeding could have been discontinued or modified if this Act had not been enacted.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to promulgate regulations providing for the orderly transfer of proceedings continued under paragraph (1) to the Department.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (e)—

(1) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the effective date of this Act, and

(2) in all such suits, proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

(d) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in the official capacity of such individual as an officer or any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any department or agency, functions of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act.

(e) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any department or agency, or officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer, is a party to a suit, and under this Act any function of such department, agency, or officer is transferred to the Secretary or any other official of the Department, then such suit shall be continued with the Secretary or other appropriate official of the Department substituted or added as a party.

(f) Orders and actions of the Secretary in the exercise of functions transferred under this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions had been by the agency or office, or part thereof, exercising such functions, immediately preceding their transfer. Any statutory requirements relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Secretary.

SEPARABILITY

Sec. 506. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remainder of this Act nor the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall be affected thereby.

REFERENCE

Sec. 507. With respect to any functions transferred by this Act and exercised after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any department, commission, or agency or to any officer or office the functions of which are so transferred shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary or Department.

TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 508. (a) Section 19(d)(1) of title 3, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately before the period a comma and the following: "Secretary of Education".

(b) Section 101 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Department of Education.".

(c) Section 5312 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(15) Secretary of Education.".

(d) Section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(70) Under Secretary of Education.".

(e) Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(128) Assistant Secretaries of Education (7).

"(129) Director of the Office for Civil Rights of the Department of Education.

"(130) General Counsel of the Department of Education.

"(131) Inspector General of the Department of Education.".

"(f) Section 5316 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(152) Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents of the Department of Education.

"(153) Additional Officer, Department of Education.".

(g) Section 5 of the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act is amended—

(1) by inserting "of Health and Welfare, the Secretary of Education," after "Secretary"; and

(2) by striking out "the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Education,".

(h)(1) Section 203 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 is amended by striking out "Commissioner, the Commissioner" and inserting "Secretary".

(2) Section 507 of such Act is amended by striking out "Health, Education, and Welfare," and inserting "Education, the Secretary of Health and Human Services,".

AMENDMENT TO THE COMPREHENSIVE EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ACT

SEC. 509. Section 306 of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 is amended to read as follows:

"CONSULTATION WITH THE SECRETARIES OF EDUCATION AND OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

"SEC. 306. The Secretary of Labor shall consult with the Secretary of Health and Human Services with respect to arrangements for services of a health or human services character under this Act. The Secretary of Labor shall consult with the Secretary of Education with respect to arrangements for services of an educational nature under this Act, and the Secretary of Education shall solicit the advice and comments of State educational agencies with respect to education services. Such education services include but are not limited to basic or general education; educational programs conducted for offenders; institutional training; health care, child care, and other supportive services; and new careers and job restructuring in the health, education, and welfare professions. When the Secretary of Labor arranges for the provision of basic education and vocational training directly, pursuant to the provisions of this title, the Secretary of Labor shall obtain the approval of the Secretary of Education for such arrangements.".

AMENDMENT TO THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT OF 1965

SEC. 510. Section 103(c)(2)(B) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall transmit the information required by this subparagraph to the Secretary of Education not later than February 1 of each year.".

REDESIGNATION

SEC. 511. (a) The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is redesignated the Department of Health and Human Services, and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is redesignated the Secretary of Health and Human Services, upon the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Any reference to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, or any other official of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in any law, rule, regulation, certificate, directive, instruction, or other official paper in force on the effective date of this Act shall be deemed to refer and apply to the Department of Health and Human Services, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, or the appropriate official of the Department of Health and Human Services, respectively, except to the extent such reference is to a function transferred to the Secretary under this Act.

TRANSITION

SEC. 512. With the consent of the appropriate department or agency head concerned, the Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of such officers, employees, and other personnel of the departments and agencies of the executive branch for such period of time as may reasonably be needed to facilitate the orderly transfer of functions under this Act.

TITLE VI—EFFECTIVE DATE AND INTERIM APPOINTMENTS

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 601. (a) The provisions of this Act shall take effect one hundred and eighty days after the Secretary first takes office, or on such earlier date as the President may prescribe and publish in the Federal Register, except that at any time after the date of enactment of this Act—

(1) any of the officers provided for in title II of this Act may be nominated and appointed as provided in such title, and

(2) the Secretary may promulgate regulations pursuant to section 505(b)(2) of this Act.

(b) Funds available to any department or agency (or any official or component thereof), the functions of which are transferred to the Secretary by this Act, may, with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, be used to pay the compensation and expenses of any officer appointed pursuant to this Act until such time as funds for that purpose are otherwise available.

INTERIM APPOINTMENTS

SEC. 602. (a) In the event that one or more officers required by this Act to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall not have entered upon office on the effective date of this Act and notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the President may designate an officer in the executive branch to act in such office for one hundred and twenty days or until the office is filled as provided in this Act, whichever occurs first.

(b) Any officer acting in an office in the Department pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for such office under this Act.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. (a) As used in this Act, unless otherwise provided or indicated by the context, the term "Department" means the Department of Education or any component thereof; the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education; and the term "Under Secretary" means the Under Secretary of Education.

(b) As used in this Act, the term "function" includes any duty, obligation, power, authority, responsibility, right, privilege, or activity.

(c) As used in this Act, unless otherwise provided or indicated by the context, the term "State" includes the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(d) As used in this Act, unless otherwise provided or indicated by the context, the words "private" and "private educational" refer to independent, nonpublic, and private institutions of elementary, secondary, higher, and postsecondary education.

(e) As used in this Act, unless otherwise provided or indicated by the context, the terms "office" and "unit" include any office, institute, council, unit, organizational entity, or component thereof.

TITLE I—FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress of the United States finds that:

(a) education is fundamental to the development of individual citizens and the progress of the Nation as a whole;

(b) there is a continuous need to ensure equal access for all Americans to educational opportunities of a high quality;

(c) the primary responsibility for education resides with States, localities, and private institutions;

(d) the American people benefit from a diversity of educational settings, including public and private schools, libraries, museums and other institutions, the workplace, the community, and the home;

(e) the current structure of the executive branch fails to recognize the importance of education and does not allow sufficient Presidential and public consideration of education issues;

(f) there is a need for improvement in the management of Federal education programs to support more effectively State, local, and private institutions in carrying out their educational responsibilities;

(g) there is a need for improved coordination of Federal education and related programs; and

(h) there is no single, full-time, Federal education official directly accountable to the President, the Congress and the people.

PURPOSES

SEC. 102. The Congress therefore declares that the establishment of a Department of Education is in the public interest and will promote the general welfare of the United States. Establishment of this Department will help ensure that education issues receive proper treatment at the Federal level and will enable the Federal Government to coordinate its education activities more effectively. The major purposes of the Department are:

(a) to strengthen the Federal commitment to ensuring access to equal educational opportunity for every American;

(b) to support more effectively States, localities, and public and private institutions in carrying out their responsibilities for education;

(c) to promote improvements in the quality and usefulness of education through federally supported research, evaluation, and the sharing of information;

(d) to improve the management and efficiency of Federal education activities;

(e) to increase the accountability of Federal education programs to the President, the Congress, and the public;

(f) to encourage the involvement of the public, parents, and students in Federal education programs; and

(g) to improve the coordination of Federal education programs.

PROHIBITION AGAINST FEDERAL CONTROL OF EDUCATION

SEC. 103. No provision of law relating to a program administered by the Secretary or by any other officer or agency of the executive branch of the Federal Government shall be construed to authorize the Secretary or any such officer or agency to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of any educational institution, school, or school system; over any accrediting agency or association; or over the selection of library resources, textbooks, or other instructional material by any educational institution or school system, except to the extent authorized by law.

Sec. 201. (a) There is hereby established an executive department to be known as the Department of Education. There shall be at the head of the Department a Secretary of Education, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be compensated at the rate provided for level I of the Executive Schedule under section 5312 of title 5 of the United States Code. The Department shall be administered, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary.

(b) There shall be in the Department an Under Secretary, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be compensated at the rate provided for level III of the Executive Schedule under section 5314 of title 5 of the United States Code. The Under Secretary shall act for and exercise the functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of the Secretary or in the event the office of Secretary becomes vacant. The Secretary shall designate the order in which other officials shall act for and perform the functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of both the Secretary and Under Secretary or in the event of vacancies in both of those offices. The Under Secretary shall also be responsible for intergovernmental relations in the Department.

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS

Sec. 202. (a) There shall be in the Department six Assistant Secretaries reporting directly to the Secretary, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be compensated at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule under section 5315 of title 5 of the United States Code. An Assistant Secretary shall head each of the Offices created by sections 203, 204, 205, and 206 of this Act.

(b) In addition, there shall be in the Department six officers reporting directly to the Secretary, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule under section 5316 of title 5 of the United States Code.

(c) The officers created by this section shall perform, in accordance with applicable law, such of the functions delegated to or vested in the Secretary or in the Department as the Secretary shall from time to time prescribe (in accordance with the provisions of this Act), including, but not limited to, the following functions:

(1) congressional relations functions;

(2) public information functions;

(3) management and budget functions;

(4) planning, evaluation, and policy development functions; and

(5) encouraging and monitoring involvement of parents, students, and the public in departmental programs.

(d) Except as otherwise provided by this Act—

(1) when the name of a person to serve as an officer created by either subsection (a) or subsection (b) is submitted to the Senate for confirmation, the President shall designate the particular functions that person shall exercise upon taking office; and

(2) notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary may from time to time allocate or reallocate functions of the Department among the subordinates of the Secretary and name and rename the titles of the offices they hold.

OFFICE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS

SEC. 203. (a) There shall be established in the Department an Office for Civil Rights headed by an Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights, who shall be one of the Assistant Secretaries created by section 202(a) of this Act.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 422 of this Act, the Secretary shall delegate to such Assistant Secretary all functions, other than administrative and support functions, vested in the Secretary by section 301(a)(3) of this Act.

(c) The Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights shall make annual reports to the Secretary and to the Congress summarizing the compliance and enforcement activities of the Office for Civil Rights and identifying significant civil rights or compliance problems as to which such Office has made a recommendation for corrective action or as to which, in the judgment of the Assistant Secretary, adequate progress is not being made.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the reports required by or under this section shall be transmitted to the Secretary and the Congress by the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights without further clearance or approval. The Assistant Secretary shall provide copies of the reports required under subsection (c) to the Secretary sufficiently in advance of their submission to Congress to provide a reasonable opportunity for comments of the Secretary to be appended to the reports when submitted to Congress.

(e) In addition to the authority otherwise provided by this section, the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights, in carrying out the provisions of this section, is authorized—

(1) to collect or coordinate collection of data necessary to ensure compliance with civil rights laws within its jurisdiction;

(2) to select, appoint, and employ such officers and employees, including staff attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Office, subject to provisions governing appointments in the competitive service and the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of title 5 of the United States Code, relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates; and

(3) notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, to obtain services as authorized by section 3109 of title 5 of the United States Code at daily rates not to exceed the equivalent rates prescribed for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule by section 5332 of such title.

OFFICE OF POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION

SEC. 204. There shall be in the Department an Office of Postsecondary Education headed by one of the Assistant Secretaries created by section 202(a) of this Act. The Assistant Secretary shall administer such functions affecting postsecondary education, both public and private, as the Secretary shall delegate to the Office and shall serve as the principal adviser to the Secretary on matters affecting public and private postsecondary education.

OFFICE OF ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

SEC. 205. There shall be in the Department an Office of Elementary and Secondary Education headed by one of the Assistant Secretaries created by section 202(a) of this Act. The Assistant Secretary shall administer such functions affecting elementary and secondary education, both public and private, as the Secretary shall delegate to the Office.

OFFICE OF EDUCATIONAL RESEARCH AND IMPROVEMENT

SEC. 206. There shall be in the Department an Office of Educational Research and Improvement headed by one of the Assistant Secretaries created by section 202(a) of this Act. The Assistant Secretary shall administer such functions and programs of the Department concerning research, development, demonstration, dissemination, evaluation, and assessment activities as the Secretary shall delegate to the Office.

FUNCTIONS RELATING TO EDUCATION OF OVERSEAS MILITARY DEPENDENTS

SEC. 207. There shall be in the Department an office to administer functions relating to the education of overseas dependents of personnel of the Department of Defense, the director of which shall be one of the officers created by section 202 of this Act.

GENERAL COUNSEL

SEC. 208. There shall be in the Department a General Counsel, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be compensated at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule under section 5315 of title 5 of the United States Code.

OFFICE OF INSPECTOR GENERAL

SEC. 209. (a) Section 2(1) of the Inspector General Act of 1978 is amended by adding "the Department of Education," after "the Department of Commerce,".

(b) Sections 11 (1) and (2) of such Act are amended by adding "Education," after the word "Commerce,".

EXECUTIVE LEVEL POSITIONS

SEC. 210. The number of executive level positions published pursuant to section 5311(b)(1) of title 5 of the United States Code is hereby increased by fourteen.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

SEC. 211. (a) There is hereby established an advisory committee to be known as the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education (hereinafter referred to as the "Council").

(b) The Council shall—

(1) provide a forum for representatives of Federal, State, and local governments and public and private educational entities to discuss educational issues;

(2) make recommendations for the improvement of Federal education programs;

(3) promote better intergovernmental relations; and

(4) submit a report, biennially or as frequently as the Council deems it necessary, to the President and the Secretary reviewing the impact of Federal education activities upon State and local governments and public and private educational institutions, including an assessment of compliance with section 103 of this Act and of any change in the Federal role in education, and assessing both the extent to which Federal objectives are achieved and any adverse consequences of Federal actions.

(c)(1) The Council shall have twenty members, appointed by the President as follows:

(A) six elected State and local officials with general government responsibilities;

(B) five representatives of public and private elementary and secondary education, including board members, administrators, and teachers;

(C) five representatives of public and private postsecondary education, including board members, administrators, and professors; and

(D) four members of the public, including parents of students and students.

(2) The Under Secretary shall be an ex officio member of the Council.

(3) Each member shall have a term of four years: Provided, That no member serving pursuant to subparagraph (1)(A) of this subsection may serve on the Council beyond the period that such member holds an office qualifying such member for appointment under such subparagraph: Provided further, That the President shall divide the initial appointments to the Council into four groups of five members each for initial terms of one, two, three, and four years.

(4) The President shall from time to time designate one member to chair the Council.

(d) The Council shall nominate and the Secretary shall appoint an Executive Director for the Council.

(e) The Secretary shall furnish such staff, services, and support as shall be necessary for the operation of the Council.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL EDUCATION COORDINATING COMMITTEE

SEC. 212. (a) There is hereby established an Interdepartmental Education Coordinating Committee (hereinafter referred to in this Act as the "Committee").

(b) The Committee shall study and make recommendations for assuring effective coordination of Federal programs, policies, and administrative practices affecting education, including—

(1) consistent administration and development of policies and practices among Federal agencies in the conduct of related programs;

(2) full and effective communication among Federal agencies to avoid unnecessary duplication of activities and repetitive collection of data;

(3) full and effective cooperation with the Secretary on such studies and analyses as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act; and

(4) coordination of related programs to assure that recipients of Federal assistance are efficiently and responsively served.

(c) The Committee shall be composed of the Secretary, who shall be the Chair, and representatives from those Federal agencies, commissions, and boards that the President may from time to time deem appropriate with regard to the matters under consideration.

(d) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, and the Executive Director of the Domestic Policy Staff may each designate a staff member to attend meetings of the Committee.

(e) The Secretary may establish subcommittees of the Committee to facilitate coordination in important areas of Federal activity.

(f) The Secretary and each Federal agency represented on the Committee under the provisions of subsection (c) of this section shall furnish necessary assistance to the Committee.

TITLE III—TRANSFERS

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

SEC. 301. (a) There are hereby transferred to and vested in the Secretary—

(4) any advisory committee and authority for any advisory committee established by statute in or under the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare or the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, giving advice or making recommendations that primarily concern education: Provided, That the Secretary may terminate or combine one or more of such advisory committees;

(5) the Institute of Museum Services in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and all functions vested in such Institute;

(6) the Advisory Council on Education Statistics and all functions vested in such Council; and

(7) the Federal Education Data Acquisition Council and all functions vested in such Council.

(b) There are hereby transferred to the Inspector General of the Department that portion of the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare that relates to functions transferred to the Secretary by this Act.

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

SEC. 302. (a) There are hereby transferred to and vested in the Secretary all functions of the Secretary of Labor or the Department of Labor under section 303(c)(2) of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to conduct the functions transferred by subsection (a).

(c) Section 303(c)(3) of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act is redesignated as subsection (d) and amended to read as follows:

"(d) For the purposes of carrying out subsections (b) and (c) of this section, the Secretary shall reserve from funds available for this title an amount equal to not less than 4⅝ percent of the amount allocated pursuant to section 202(a).".

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Sec. 303. (a) Notwithtanding the provisions of section 601 of this Act, there shall be transferred to and vested in the Secretary, at such time and in such manner as the President may designate, but not later than three years after the effective date of this Act, all functions and offices vested in the Secretary of Defense or the Department of Defense by the Defense Dependents' Education Act of 1978.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 422 of this Act, the Secretary shall delegate to the director of the office created by section 207 of this Act all functions, other than administrative and support functions, vested in the Secretary by subsection (a) of this section.

(c) Not later than one year after the effective date of this Act, the Secretary, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, shall transmit to the Congress a plan for effecting the transfer of functions under this section and administering those functions. In designing this plan, the Secretary shall also consult with representatives of sponsors of students enrolled in overseas dependents' schools and of professional employee organizations and administrators of such schools.

TRANSFERS FROM THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Sec. 304. (a) There are hereby transferred to and vested in the Secretary all programs relating to science education of the National Science Foundation or its Director established prior to the effective date of this Act pursuant to section 3(a)(1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950, except such programs, as determined by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget (after consultation with the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy), that relate to (1) fellowships and traineeships integral to the support of scientific research and development, (2) ethical, value, and science policy issues, or (3) communicating information to practitioners of science and technology and to nonscientists. Except as provided in section 301(a)(1) of this Act, no mission-oriented research functions or programs of the National Science Foundation nor of any other Federal agency shall be transferred by this Act.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to conduct the programs transferred by subsection (a). In conducting such programs, the Secretary shall consult, as appropriate, with the Director of the National Science Foundation.

(c) Nothing in this section is intended to repeal or limit the authority of the National Science Foundation or the Director of the National Science Foundation under section 3(a)(1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950 to initiate and conduct programs not established prior to the effective date of this Act.

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

SEC. 305. There are hereby transferred to and vested in the Secretary all functions vested in the Attorney General, the Department of Justice, or the Administrator of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (or any successor agency thereto) with regard to the student loan and grant programs known as the law enforcement education program and the law enforcement intern program authorized by subsections (b), (c), and (f) of section 406 of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968.

TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 306. There are hereby transferred to and vested in the Secretary all functions relating to college housing loans vested in the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development or the Department of Housing and Urban Development by title IV of the Housing Act of 1950.

EFFECT OF TRANSFERS

SEC. 307. The transfer of a function, program, or office from an officer or agency to the Secretary or to the Department includes any aspect of such function, program, or office vested in a subordinate of such officer or in a component of such agency.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

PART A—PERSONNEL PROVISIONS

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

SEC. 401. (a) The Secretary is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, including attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Secretary and the Department. Except as otherwise provided by law, such officers and employees shall be appointed in accordance with the civil service laws and their compensation fixed in accordance with title 5 of the United States Code.

(b)(1) Notwithstanding the second sentence of section 5108(a) of title 5 of the United States Code, the Secretary may place at grade levels GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18 a number of positions in such grades equal to the number assigned and employed on the day preceding the effective date of this Act in connection with functions transferred under this Act.

(2) Notwithstanding the second sentence of section 3104 of title 5 of the United States Code, the Secretary may establish within the Office created by section 206 of this Act all scientific, professional, and technical positions outside the General Schedule assigned and employed on the day preceding the effective date of this Act in connection with functions, offices, and programs transferred under this Act.

(3) Appointments under this subsection may be made without regard to the provisions of sections 3104 and 3324 of title 5 of the United States Code, if the individual appointed in such position is an individual who is transferred in connection with a transfer of functions, offices, or programs under this Act and, immediately before the effective date of this Act, holds a position and duties comparable to those of the position to which appointed hereunder.

(4) Except as provided in subsection (c), the authority of the Secretary under this subsection to appoint personnel without regard to sections 3104, 3324, and 5108(a) of title 5 of the United States Code shall cease with respect to any position when the person first appointed to fill such position leaves such position.

(5) For purposes of section 414(a)(3)(A) of the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978, an individual appointed under this subsection shall be deemed to occupy the same position as he or she occupied on the day before the effective date of this Act.

(c) The Secretary may appoint, without regard to the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code governing appointment in the competitive service, up to one hundred and twelve scientific, technical, or professional employees of the Office created by section 206 of this Act and may compensate employees so appointed without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates. The rate of basic compensation for such employees shall not be equal to or in excess of the rate of pay currently paid for GS-16 of the General Schedule of section 5332 of title 5 of the United States Code.

(d) Subject to section 3134 of title 5 of the United States Code, but notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management shall establish positions within the Senior Executive Service for fifteen limited term appointees. The Secretary shall appoint individuals to such positions as provided by section 3394 of title 5 of the United States Code. Such positions shall expire on the latter of three years after the effective date of this Act or three years after the initial appointment to each position.

(e) Notwithstanding the transfer of functions affected by section 303 of this Act (and the consequent transfer of personnel), personnel performing such functions shall have commissary and post exchange privileges in facilities of the Armed Forces.

EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS

SEC. 402. The Secretary may obtain services as authorized by section 3109 of title 5 of the United States Code at rates not to exceed the daily rate prescribed for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title for persons in Government service employed intermittently.

PART B—GENERAL PROVISIONS

GENERAL AUTHORITY

SEC. 421. In carrying out the functions or conducting offices or programs transferred by this Act, the Secretary, or any officer or employee of the Department, may exercise any authority or part thereof available by law (including appropriation Acts) with respect to such function, office, or program to the official or agency from which such function, office, or program is transferred.

DELEGATION

SEC. 422. Except as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, the Secretary may delegate any function, office, or program vested in the Secretary to such officers and employees of the Department as the Secretary may designate and may authorize such successive redelegations of such function, office, or program within the Department as the Secretary may deem to be necessary or appropriate.

REORGANIZATION

SEC. 423. The Secretary is authorized to establish, alter, consolidate, or discontinue such organizational units or components within the Department as the Secretary may deem to be necessary or appropriate. Such authority shall not extend to the abolition of organizational units or components established by this Act, or to the transfer of functions, offices, or programs vested by this Act in such organizational unit or component.

RULES

SEC. 424. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as the Secretary may deem necessary or appropriate to administer and manage the functions, offices, and programs vested in the Secretary or the Department in accordance with chapter 5 of title 5 of the United States Code.

CONTRACTS

SEC. 425. Subject to the provisions of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, the Secretary is authorized to make, enter into, and perform such contracts, grants, leases, cooperative agreements, or other similar transactions with Federal or other public agencies (including State and local governments) and private organizations and persons, and to make such payments, by way of advance or reimbursement, as the Secretary may deem necessary or appropriate to carry out functions and programs vested in the Secretary or the Department.

REGIONAL AND FIELD OFFICES

SEC. 426. The Secretary is authorized to establish, alter, discontinue, or maintain such regional or other field offices as the Secretary may deem to be necessary or appropriate to perform functions and programs vested in the Secretary or the Department.

ACQUISITION AND MAINTENANCE OF PROPERTY

SEC. 427. (a) The Secretary is authorized to acquire (by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise), construct, improve, repair, operate, and maintain schools and related facilities (but only to the extent that operation of schools and related facilities by the Department is authorized by this Act), laboratories, research and testing sites and facilities, quarters and related accommodations for employees and dependents of employees of the Department, personal property, or any interest therein, as the Secretary deems necessary, and to provide by contract or otherwise for eating facilities and other necessary facilities for the health and welfare of employees of the Department at its installations and purchase and maintain equipment therefor.

(b) The authority available to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare under section 524 of the Education Amendments of 1976 shall also be available to the Secretary.

(c) The authority granted by subsection (a) of this section shall be available only with respect to facilities of a special purpose nature that cannot readily be reassigned from similar Federal activities and are not otherwise available for assignment to the Department by the Administrator of General Services.

FACILITIES AT REMOTE LOCATIONS

SEC. 428. (a) The Secretary is authorized to provide, construct, or maintain, as necessary and when not otherwise available, the following for employees and their dependents stationed at remote locations:

(1) emergency medical services and supplies;

(2) food and other subsistence supplies;

(3) dining facilities;

(4) audio-visual equipment, accessories, and supplies for recreation and training;

(5) reimbursement for food, clothing, medicine, and other supplies furnished by such employees in emergencies for the temporary relief of distressed persons;

(6) living and working quarters and facilities; and

(7) transportation for school-age dependents of employees to the nearest appropriate educational facilities.

(b) The furnishing of medical treatment under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) and the furnishing of services and supplies under paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subsection (a) shall be at prices reflecting reasonable value as determined by the Secretary.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriations or funds that bear all or a part of the cost of such work or services or to refund excess sums when necessary.

USE OF FACILITIES

SEC. 429. (a) With their consent, the Secretary may, with or without reimbursement, use the research, equipment, services, and facilities of any agency or instrumentality of the United States, of any State, or of any foreign government, in carrying out any function or program vested in the Secretary or in the Department.

(b) In carrying out his duties, the Secretary, under such terms, at such rates and for such periods (not exceeding five years), as the Secretary may deem to be in the public interest, is authorized to permit the use by public and private agencies, corporations, associations, or other organizations, or by individuals, of any real property, or any facility, structure, or other improvement thereon, acquired pursuant to sections 427 and 428, under the custody and control of the Secretary for Department purposes. The Secretary may require permittees under this section to recondition and maintain to a satisfactory standard, at their own expense, the real property, facilities, structures, and improvements involved. This subsection shall not apply to excess property as defined in section 3(e) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949.

(c) Proceeds from reimbursements under this section may be credited to the appropriations or funds that bear all or a part of the cost of such work or services or to refund excess sums when necessary, except that such proceeds may be credited to a working capital fund otherwise lawfully established, including a fund established pursuant to section 432 of this Act and used under the law governing such fund.

(d) All interests in real property acquired pursuant to this Act shall be acquired in the name of the United States Government.

COPYRIGHTS AND PATENTS

SEC. 430. The Secretary is authorized to acquire any of the following described rights if the property acquired thereby is for use by or for, or useful to, the Department:

(a) copyrights, patents, and applications for patents, designs, processes, and manufacturing data;

(b) licenses under copyrights, patents, and applications for patents; and

(c) releases, before suit is brought, for past infringement of patents or copyrights.

GIFTS AND BEQUESTS

SEC. 431. The Secretary is authorized to accept, hold, administer, and utilize gifts, bequests, and devises of property, both real and personal, for the purpose of aiding or facilitating the work of the Department. Gifts, bequests, and devises of money and proceeds from sales of other property received as gifts, bequests, or devises shall be deposited in the Treasury and shall be available for disbursement upon the order of the Secretary.

WORKING CAPITAL FUND

SEC. 432. (a) The Secretary, with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, is authorized to establish for the Department a working capital fund, to be available without fiscal year limitation, for expenses necessary for the maintenance and operation of such common administrative services as the Secretary shall find to be desirable in the interests of economy and efficiency, including such services as a central supply service for stationery and other supplies and equipment for which adequate stocks may be maintained to meet in whole or in part the requirements of the Department and its components; central messenger, mail, telephone, and other communications services; office space; central services for document reproduction, and for graphics and visual aids; and a central library service.

(b) The capital of the fund shall consist of any appropriations made for the purpose of providing working capital and the fair and reasonable value of such stocks of supplies, equipment, and other assets and inventories on order as the Secretary may transfer to the fund, less related liabilities and unpaid obligations. Such funds shall be reimbursed in advance from available funds of agencies and offices in the Department, or from other sources, for supplies and services at rates that will approximate the expense of operation, including the accrual of annual leave and the depreciation of equipment. The fund shall also be credited with receipts from sale or exchange of property and receipts in payment for loss or damage to property owned by the fund. There shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any surplus of the fund (all assets, liabilities, and prior losses considered) above the amounts transferred or appropriated to establish and maintain such fund. There shall be transferred to the fund the stocks of supplies, equipment, other assets, liabilities, and unpaid obligations relating to the services which the Secretary determines, with the approval of the Office of Management and Budget, will be performed.

FUNDS TRANSFER

SEC. 433. The Secretary may, when authorized in an appropriation Act in any fiscal year, transfer funds from one appropriation to another within the Department, except that no appropriation for any fiscal year may be thus increased or decreased by more than 10 per centum.

SEAL OF DEPARTMENT

SEC. 434. The Secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Department of such design as the Secretary shall approve. Judicial notice shall be taken of such seal.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 435. (a) The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year, make a single comprehensive report to the President for transmission to the Congress on the activities of the Department during such fiscal year. Such report shall include a statement of goals, priorities, and plans for the Department together with an assessment of the progress made toward the attainment of those objectives, the more effective and efficient management of the Department, and the coordination of its functions.

(b)(1) In preparing and developing the report required by subsection (a), the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consult with members of the public, including representatives of parents, students, educators, State and local governments, private institutions, other organizations, and individuals. The Secretary shall hold such public hearings in the District of Columbia and in such other locations as the Secretary deems appropriate to maximize public participation.

(2) The Secretary may reimburse any person for expenses reasonably incurred in the course of consultation or hearings under paragraph (1) if such person—

(A) has made or is likely to make a material contribution to the work of the Department; and

(B) could not otherwise participate fully and effectively in such consultation.

(3) For purposes of this section, the term "person" shall have the same meaning as in section 551(2) of title 5 of the United States Code.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 436. Subject to any limitation on appropriations applicable with respect to any function or program transferred to the Department or the Secretary, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and to enable the Department and the Secretary to perform any function or conduct any program or office that may be vested in the Department or the Secretary. Funds appropriated in accordance with this section shall remain available until expended.

RELATIONSHIP TO GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS ACT

SEC. 437. Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the General Education Provisions Act shall apply to functions transferred by this Act to the extent applicable on the day preceding the effective date of this Act.

TECHNICAL ADVICE

SEC. 438. (a) The Secretary is authorized, upon request, to provide advice, counsel, and technical assistance to applicants or potential applicants for grants and contracts and other interested persons with respect to any functions or programs of the Secretary or the Department.

(b) The Secretary may permit the consolidation of applications for grants or contracts with respect to two or more functions or programs administered by the Secretary or the Department: Provided, That such packaging or consolidation shall not alter the statutory criteria for approval of applications for funding with respect to such functions or programs.

TITLE V—TRANSITIONAL, SAVINGS AND CONFORMING PROVISIONS

TRANSFER AND ALLOCATION OF APPROPRIATIONS AND PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the personnel employed in connection with, and the assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds employed, held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with the functions, programs, offices, or portions thereof transferred by this Act, subject to section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1950, shall be transferred to the Secretary for appropriate allocation. Unexpended funds transferred pursuant to this subsection shall be used only for the purposes for which the funds were originally authorized and appropriated.

(b) Positions expressly specified by statute or reorganization plan to carry out functions, offices or programs transferred by this Act, personnel occupying those positions on the effective date of this Act, and personnel authorized to receive compensation in such positions at the rate prescribed for offices and positions at level I, II, III, IV, or V of the executive schedule (5 U.S.C. 5312–5316) on the effective date of this Act, shall be subject to the provisions of section 503 of this Act.

EFFECT ON PERSONNEL

SEC. 502. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the transfer pursuant to this title of full-time personnel (except special Government employees) and part-time personnel holding permanent positions pursuant to this title shall not cause any such employee to be separated or reduced in grade or compensation for one year after the date of transfer to the Department.

(b) Any person who, on the day preceding the effective date of this Act, holds a position compensated in accordance with the Executive Schedule prescribed in chapter 53 of title 5 of the United States Code and who, without a break in service, is appointed in the Department to a position having duties comparable to those performed in such prior position shall continue to be compensated in such new position at not less than the rate provided for the previous position, for the duration of the service of such person in the new position.

AGENCY TERMINATIONS

SEC. 503. (a) The following offices shall terminate upon the transfer of functions or programs pursuant to this Act:

(1) the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (but not the National Institute of Education);

(2) the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(3) the Office of Education and the Office of the Commissioner of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; and

(4) the Office for Dependents' Schools of the Department of Defense.

(b) Each position which was expressly authorized by law, or the incumbent of which was authorized to receive compensation at the rate prescribed for level IV or V of the Executive Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5315-5316), in an office terminated pursuant to this Act shall also terminate.

(c)(1) The director of any office in the Department the director of which was required prior to the effective date of this Act to report to the Commissioner of Education or the Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare shall report to the Secretary.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to delegate reporting requirements vested in the Secretary by paragraph (1) of this subsection to any officer or employee of the Department.

INCIDENTAL TRANSFERS

SEC. 504. (a) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, at such time or times as the Director shall provide, is authorized and directed—

(1) to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the transfer of functions, programs, offices, or portions thereof that relate to or are utilized by an officer, agency, commission, or other body, or component thereof, transferred by this Act; and

(2) to make such additional incidental dispositions of personnel, assets, liabilities, contracts, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, authorizations, allocations, and other funds held, used, arising from, available to, or to be made available in connection with such functions, programs, offices, or portions thereof, as the Director may deem necessary to accomplish the purposes of this Act.

(b) The Director shall provide for terminating the affairs of all offices terminated by this Act and for such further measures and dispositions as the Director deems necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

(c) After consultation with the Director of the Office of Personnel Management, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget is authorized and directed, at such time as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide, to make such determinations as may be necessary with regard to the transfer of positions within the Senior Executive Service in connection with functions transferred by this Act.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 505. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, grants, contracts, certificates, and privileges that—

(1) have been lawfully issued, made, granted, or allowed to become effective in the performance of functions or programs which are transferred under this Act to the Department after the date of enactment of this Act, and

(2) are in effect at the time this Act takes effect, shall continue in effect according to their terms until lawfully modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or revoked.

(b)(1) The provisions of this Act shall not affect any proceedings (including, but not limited to, notices of proposed rulemaking) or any application for any license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance pending at the time this Act takes effect before any department, agency, commission, or component thereof, functions, offices, or programs of which are transferred by this Act; but such proceedings and applications, to the extent that they relate to functions, offices, or programs so transferred, shall be continued. Orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until lawfully modified, terminated, superseded, or revoked. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to prohibit the discontinuance or modification of any such proceeding under the same terms and conditions and to the same extent that such proceeding could have been discontinued or modified if this Act had not been enacted.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to promulgate regulations providing for the orderly transfer of such proceedings to the Department.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (e)—

(1) the provisions of this Act shall not affect suits commenced prior to the date this Act takes effect; and

(2) in all such suits, proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

(d) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against any officer in his official capacity as an officer of any department or agency, functions or programs of which are transferred by this Act, shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act. No cause of action by or against any department or agency, functions or programs of which are transferred by this Act, or by or against any officer thereof in his official capacity shall abate by reason of the enactment of this Act.

(e) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, any department or agency, or officer thereof, in his official capacity, is a party to a suit, and under this Act any function, office, or program of such department, agency, or officer is transferred to the Secretary or any other official, then such suit, insofar as it relates to such function, office, or program, shall be continued with the Secretary or other official, as the case may be, substituted.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 506. If any provision of this Act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remainder of this Act nor the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall be affected thereby.

REFERENCE

SEC. 507. With respect to any function or program transferred by this Act and exercised after the effective date of this Act, reference in any other Federal law to any department, commission, or agency, or any officer or office the functions or programs of which are so transferred shall be deemed to refer to the Secretary, other official, or component of the Department in which this Act vests such functions.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1979

March 27 (legislative day, February 22), 1979.—Ordered to be printed

Mr. Ribicoff, from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, submitted the following

REPORT

[To accompany S. 210]

The Committee on Governmental Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 210) to establish a Department of Education in the executive branch, and for other purposes, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and recommends that the bill as amended do pass.

The Need for a Department of Education

The Committee on Governmental Affairs has spent more than two years considering legislation to separate education from HEW and give it Cabinet rank. In its lengthy investigation, the Committee has found there is indeed a significant, but carefully restrained Federal role in education. Total Federal spending for education is more than $25 billion annually. That Federal effort, however, is severely hampered by its burial in HEW, its burial in HEW, its confusing lines of authority and administration, its fragmentation, and its obvious lack of direction. A hampered and deficient Federal education effort places an adverse strain on States, localities, and public and nonpublic educational institutions. The Committee believes the establishment of a Cabinet-level Department of Education will go far towards remedying these problems, thereby enabling the Federal government to improve its contribution to the betterment of American education. There is a strong and persuasive need for a Department of Education.

INCREASED STATUS AND VISIBILITY

Establishment of a Department of Education would greatly increase the status and visibility of education in the Federal government and give it rightful recognition as a fundamental activity of American life.

Throughout the Federal government today, education is lodged between and under layers of bureaucracy, and resides in fourth and fifth-level bureaus and offices. There is no one Federal official who speaks for education's needs and problems—and no one to work with Congress and the President to develop remedies for them.

In the United States, the people are involved in decisionmaking at all levels of government, so education is and should be of concern to Federal, State, and local governments. The process of education is basic to our society and to the proper functioning of democratic government. Democracy depends for its very existence on a highly educated citizenry.

Education is, perhaps, the single most pervasive function of American society. Education today directly involves more than 60 million Americans. Total education spending in the U.S. today exceeds that spent on the national defense by one-third. More than $145 billion—nearly 10 percent of the gross national product—was spent nationwide last year on education. It is as important a function as commerce, labor, housing, transportation, or agriculture (which are represented in the nation's Cabinet).

In testimony before the Committee, U.S. Commissioner of Education Ernest Boyer said:

> Education has always been the driving engine of this democracy. It stimulates our culture. It contributes dramatically to our economy. It is the foundation upon which our government is built. Education and democracy are inextricably interlocked, and it should have full partnership at the highest levels of government where the Nation's priorities are shaped.

More and more, it is apparent how closely education meshes with all other facets of American life. And, in this increasingly complex world, education programs are developing everywhere just to explain new technologies in energy, health, science, agriculture, business, and many other fields.

There is a real need for a Cabinet Secretary of Education, who could work together with other members of the Cabinet to better explain the world's complexities and prepare Americans for their future.

The Reverend Jesse Jackson told the Committee:

> The elimination of ignorance, poverty, and disease requires increased emphasis on education. Aiding the developing third and fourth world nations requires education. The issues of world peace and justice demand that increased education play a part. Space travel and ecological concerns require an increased educational focus. Creatively developing the world's renewable energy resources demands mind development. In short, everything worth doing and accomplishing has education as a foundation from which to start. . . . Education needs a full-time advocate.

Creation of a Department of Education, headed by a Cabinet Secretary of Education, will elevate education to the highest levels of the Federal government. The Cabinet signifies all that is important to us, and represents the nation's council of men and women of great wisdom and intellect. They are advisors not only to the President and to the Congress, but to the American people.

In testimony before the Committee, it was cited that the Federal government's highest ranking education officials never had private meetings with the President of the United States. The Committee was also told that the Federal Officials discussing education most with the President is not the Secretary of HEW, nor the Commissioner of Education. Instead, it is the Attorney General.

Access to the President—something rarely realized before by a Federal education official—would be institutionalized through the establishment of the Department of Education.

The Committee believes the establishment of the Department of Education will increase significantly the status and visibility of education not only within the Federal government, but also within the American conscience. As a result, education would continue to play an integral part of our lives.

Increasing the status and visibility of education will have the beneficial effect of increasing scrutiny of, and participation in, education programs and services by the general public. A Cabinet Secretary of Education will be in a position to bring to the attention of Congress, the President, and the American people education matters which are ever-changing.

HEW'S INSTITUTIONAL DEFICIENCIES

Of paramount concern to the Committee has been the extreme size, responsibilities, and unmanageability of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the largest Cabinet department of the U.S. government.

Only two organizational entities on earth have budgets larger than HEW's—the governments of the United States and of the Soviet Union. In Fiscal Year 1980, HEW's budget will break the $200 billion mark—nearly 40 per cent of the total Federal budget. Of this, nearly 95 per cent will be spent on health and welfare programs, the remainder on education ($13 billion).

HEW's more than 325 programs inevitably touch nearly every living American. Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and a host of other comprehensive programs serve most of the Nation's 220 million citizens. They are all vital to the daily survival of many people. HEW's mandate to safeguard the health and welfare of the American people is an awesome responsibility. So awesome, in fact, that the HEW Secretary has all he or she can do just managing health and welfare services. Education inevitably suffers. In its examination of the history of HEW, the Committee has found a severe institutional defect in the Federal structure—the lumping of health, education, and welfare programs together in one Cabinet department.

Repeatedly, throughout its 25-year history, HEW has been reorganized and reorganized for better management. There has been little success. Last year, the HEW Inspector General reported as much as $8 billion in fraud and abuse in health and welfare programs.

But no amount of in-house reorganization could correct the situation within HEW. The Committee finds that the overall mission of HEW has changed so substantially since its formation that education is "out-of-place" in that Department. Education is operating separately and distinctly from health and welfare, and benefits little from nonexistent "linkages" to them.

In the last 20 years, the Federal government's role in health and welfare has expanded 10 times faster than that of education. The basic mission of HEW, consequently, has slowly evolved into funding and administering income maintenance programs—all in the health and welfare category. In this process, education has become more and more out-of-place in HEW because it is not an income maintenance activity. As such, there is virtually no interaction between education programs on the one hand, and health and welfare programs on the other.

Putting health, education, and welfare together in one Cabinet department in order to develop a comprehensive human services approach in government has not worked in the past at HEW. The facts indicate it will not work in the future. No other country in the world places these three components together in one governmental agency.

In testimony before the Committee, Education Division employees said they rarely conduct discussions or even have contact with the other 150,000 employees who work for HEW. They have reason to. Most of the six former U.S. Commissioners of Education who testified before the Committee in October 1977 agreed they were involved more in coordination with those programs outside HEW, such as the school lunch program in USDA, or the CETA program in the Department of Labor. Rufus Miles, Jr., a former director of administration at HEW for more than 12 years, told the Committee:

> In all my years at HEW, I never saw any significant coordination of programs and functions between the Office of Education and the other components of HEW. This coordination * * * is simply a figment of the imagination.

In managing a Cabinet department which has almost half of the entire U.S. government budget, most of which is in health and welfare programs, it is unreasonable to expect the HEW Secretary to devote an adequate amount of attention to education programs. The HEW Secretary carries a disproportionate burden of Federal social service responsibilities. No matter how capable the individual, the HEW Secretary simply does not have the time and energy to devote the attention necessary to manage efficiently the "H," the "W," and the "E" simultaneously. President Carter surprised the Nation last year by observing the Cabinet official who discussed education with him most was the Attorney General.

The Committee believes the establishment of the Department of Education will significantly improve the administration of, and attention given to, health, education, and welfare programs. Our Nation's health and welfare programs are so important and vital that they are deserving of the undivided attention of a single Cabinet secretary. In the same vein, so too are our education programs so very important as to merit high-level leadership at the Cabinet level.

Taking the "E" out of HEW would free the HEW Secretary of one major responsibility—education—so that he or she could better manage the rapidly-growing health and welfare programs. The Committee finds no justification for administering Federal education programs in their present form with Federal health and welfare programs in one agency. The lumping together of health, education, and welfare in a single Cabinet department has created so severe an institutional deficiency that all three components suffer from lack of attention, oversight, and scrutiny.

FRAGMENTED EDUCATION LEADERSHIP

Working within the HEW system has been a painful and frustrating job for past U.S. commissioners of education. In the last 13 years, the post of U.S. Commissioner of Education has changed hands 14 different times. This tremendous lack of stability does serious harm to the Federal education effort. Lack of continuity in programs and policies is common, and has an adverse impact on State and local governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions.

Because of the importance of education in this country, the top education position in the U.S. should be attractive enough that the most qualified people continue to be attracted to government service. In the present situation, such is not the case.

The Department of Education is sorely needed to correct the serious fragmentation in education leadership within the Federal government. As education programs have proliferated throughout nearly every Federal agency, the number of scattered, low-level bureaucrats has also increased. Within the HEW Education Division itself, leadership is split between the U.S. Commissioner of Education and the Assistant Secretary for Education. Congress created the position of Assistant Secretary in 1972 in an attempt to elevate the status of education within HEW, but left most program responsibility with the Commissioner. In recent years, the two positions have often conflicted.

By establishing the Department of Education, the positions of Commissioner and Assistant Secretary would automatically be abolished, and primary responsibility for education within the Federal government would be placed in one official—the Secretary of Education. Elevating the Federal government's top education official to the rank of Cabinet secretary would eliminate nearly all of this frustration presently found within HEW and attract the most capable men and women for the job.

INCREASED ACCOUNTABILITY

As the lead Federal official for education, the Secretary of Education will also be the most accountable. The Committee believes one of the most tangible benefits from the establishment of the Department of Education is the increased accountability of Federal education officials and programs.

In the present HEW set-up, education officials cannot be held accountable because they are submerged under layers of bureaucracy and because they are not actually the individuals responsible for many decisions. In HEW, there are three layers of bureaucracy between the Assistant Secretary for Education and the HEW Secretary, and still another layer on top of the Commissioner of Education. Most of the ultimate responsibility for policymaking and decisions on rules and regulations rests not with the Commissioner, and not with the Assistant Secretary, but instead with one of the thousands of sometimes anonymous bureaucrats in that large layer known as the "Office of the Secretary" of HEW.

Since the HEW Secretary spends the bulk of his or her time managing and dealing with health and welfare issues, a significant amount of authority is delegated to staffers of the Office of the Secretary for clearing departmental decisions on education. It is difficult for Congress or the public to hold the HEW Secretary accountable for education problems because of this.

The end result is little or no accountability in Federal education programs in the existing structure. Today, all education officials must "report to someone else." And, for citizens, parents, educators, and students, finding that "someone else" is troublesome.

But, by removing education from HEW and making it a separate Cabinet agency, there is no "someone else." The new Secretary of Education, and the ten principal subordinate officers, will be clearly visible, responsible, and confirmed by the Senate. For the first time, one individual alone will be the out-front decisionmaker and policymaker for the Federal level—the Secretary of Education. The level of accountability will rise substantially.

IMPROVED MANAGEMENT OF EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Establishing a Department of Education will greatly improve the management of Federal education programs through the creation of a clearly-ordered, well-defined structure.

Presently, there are two components of the Education Division of HEW—the office of the Assistant Secretary for Education, and the U.S. Office of Education. In its frustration over the years in trying to make education programs operate better within the HEW complex, Congress has found it necessary to reach down four and five layers deep within the Education Division and specify the structure of offices and bureaus. Nearly all of the 30-odd offices in the "E" are locked into place by statute. Their location and reporting relationships are established by law. There are few agencies of the Federal government where Congress has, over a period of time, mandated such an inflexible arrangement and structure.

The result of this piecemeal approach to government organization has been a structure that is both confusing and duplicative. The Education Division contains at least 22 "principal" officers and offices, most of which report by law to the Commissioner of Education. A few offices report to the Assistant Secretary. The continuing question has been, who has authority over who?

In the legislation reported by the Committee (S. 210), a simple and clearly-ordered structure for Federal education programs would be established. The number of principal officers and offices will be reduced to just 11, all reporting directly to one individual—the Secretary of Education. Further, Section 413 of the bill provides to the Secretary a method for reorganizing and rearranging the myriad of offices and reporting relationships transferred to the Department of Education. The Committee believes this will aid significantly in increasing the management efficiency and effectiveness of these programs and services.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR REDUCING FEDERAL BURDENS

Improving management, accountability, fragmented leadership, and coordination will all contribute substantially to presenting good opportunities for reducing Federal government burdens in education.

The paperwork-red tape burden from Federal education programs has steadily escalated to wasteful levels over the past two decades. One State education commissioner told the Committee he is forced to hire more than 20 staffers at average annual salaries of $20,000 just to keep up with Federal paperwork, rules, and regulations. The situation today is one where literally dozens of low-level Federal education officials are scattered throughout as many as 40 different agencies, each operating separately and independently of one another, each writing their own rules and regulations, each perpetuating their forms and data requirements. As proposed education rules and regulations creep up through the many layers of HEW and other cabinet agencies for clearance and alterations, there is a lack of focus, of perspective, of coordination, and certainly much delay in delivering funds where Congress mandates. State and local governments, public and nonpublic education institutions suffer from this confusing, duplicative situation, and in the long run parents and students suffer.

[3] Technically, the Assistant Secretary is the principal officer of the Education Division.

[4] The Museum Services Board and Institute report to the Secretary by law, but principal oversight has been delegated to the Assistant Secretary.

In establishing the Department of Education, there are many ways in which Federal burdens can be reduced. First, the bill streamlines the structure to increase efficiency. For example, at least 15 offices would be eliminated from the clearance process for education regulations, thereby enabling the Federal government to cut clearance time down from as high as two and three years to less than one. Second, by increasing the accountability of Federal education officials, unreasonable or burdensome regulations will be pinpointed, and more openly debated and focused on by educators across the country. They will know exactly who is responsible for the decision. Third, a significant level of consolidation is achieved in the legislation so as to reduce paperwork and red tape. Finally, and perhaps most importantly, there will be a chief education official—the Secretary of Education—who will be on a par with other Cabinet secretaries and will have the clout to work with them and point out conflicting and duplicative rules, regulations, and paperwork in their respective agencies.

The Committee believes the Department of Education will work effectively towards reducing and simplifying the existing burdens that come with many Federal education programs.

MINIMIZED COSTS, MAXIMIZED SAVINGS

The Committee believes the establishment of the Department of Education will result in no additional cost, but will actually save millions of dollars. The Committee has worked to reduce administrative costs associated with Federal education programs and to increase the management efficiency, while at the same time elevating the status of education in the Federal government.

The legislation, as reported, provides for eleven principal officers and offices in the Department, down from nearly 30 connected with those offices and programs transferred. The Department of Education's budget ($14.5 billion), made up of existing staff and appropriations, will be larger than that of five existing Cabinet departments. But the Department will have the least amount of executive level positions, assistant secretaries, supergrades, and full-time permanent positions of any Cabinet department.

Although the bill provides for 42 new supergrades to assist in managing the department, the Office of Management and Budget projects that at least 350–450 positions will be eliminated in the many layers of the existing HEW structure. In the many offices dealing with education at HEW, there is a tremendous amount of duplication in staff responsibilities. For example, there are offices for management, budget, policy, planning and evaluation, legislative affairs, and public affairs in the Office of the Commissioner, in the Office of the Assistant Secretary, and in the Office of the Secretary of HEW. Establishment of the Department of Education will eliminate at least three layers of these functions and replace them with one. The savings in dollars will be substantial.

The Committee has also included a section in the legislation, Section 403, which will mandate that Congress establish each year an "end strength" for personnel employed by the Department of Education. This will be a useful device for Congress to control what some have termed "bureaucratic creep", where personnel are added and raised in status sometimes unnecessarily.

The Office of Management and Budget further estimates a long-term savings of more than $100 million through the establishment of the Department of Education. Giving the Secretary of Education the flexibility to restructure the conglomeration of small offices now existing in the HEW Education Division will improve efficiency. By consolidating the administrative functions of many of these programs, substantial savings could be realized. The new Department will also be in an excellent position to institute an improved financial management and audit system exclusively for education programs. Such a system could aid greatly in clearing up past-due accounts for student loan programs, and in auditing large education funding programs, such as the widely-known "Title I" program.

And finally, the Committee believes that by removing the "E" from HEW, there will be opportunities to improve the management and efficiency of health and welfare programs. Fraud and abuse has run high in the past in health and welfare programs at HEW. Last year, the HEW Inspector General found almost $8 billion was misspent. The Department of Health and Human Services will be in a better position to devote more scrutiny to health and welfare programs once major education responsibilities are transferred to the Department of Education.

PUBLIC SUPPORT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

The Committee is impressed with the widespread public support for a Cabinet-level Department of Education.

Parents, citizens, students, teachers, school administrators, State and local government officials, and many other individuals from all walks of life have contacted the Committee to express their support for the new Department.

More than 100 major national organizations and associations have endorsed the Department of Education proposal. They include most education organizations, and labor, civil rights, citizen, and parent groups. It is important to note the Department is supported by a number of State and local organizations, including the National School Boards Association, National Association of State Boards of Education, Council of Chief State School Officers, Education Commission of the States, and National Conference of State Legislatures.

The Committee believes the establishment of the Department of Education is in concert with established and traditional American public support for education, and for efficient and responsive government.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The purpose of S. 210 is to provide for the establishment of a separate Cabinet Department of Education.

President Carter, in his State of the Union Address January 23, 1979, commented on the importance of the new department:

"Education issues deserve far more attention than they receive in a Department as large and complex as H.E.W. * * *". The new department, he said, will "enable the Federal Government to be a more responsive and reliable partner with States, localities, and private institutions that have primary responsibility for education."

The need to provide equal access to education for all Americans, advancing technologies, declining school enrollments, failing confidence in public education, high drop-out rates, increasing numbers of older citizens interested in lifelong careers, displaced homemakers, and a myriad of other factors present new challenges to our educational institutions.

The bill specifically addresses the need for improved management of existing Federal education programs at the Federal level. Its purpose is to supplement and complement the efforts of States and local governments in their education efforts to meet the education challenges facing them.

At present, the Federal government is conducting education programs in nearly 40 different agencies at a cost of more than $25 billion in 1979. The rapid growth of Federal education programs has caused a piecemeal approach in their administration. There is no one to speak for education in the President's cabinet or to attempt to coordinate the myriad of education programs. Furthermore, a more serious problem is the lack of accountability for education at the Federal level. Although billions of dollars are spent, there is overlap and duplication of burdensome regulations which adds to the frustration of States and localities in the administration of Federal education programs. Thus, the purpose of S. 210 is to make the Federal education effort more effective and coordinated in order to improve the quality and administration of Federal assistance to education.

Education in the United States has traditionally been a function of State and local governments and private institutions. Over the past 25 years, education has commanded the largest single share of State and local governmental expenditures—38 percent.

The intention of S. 210 is to preserve this prerogative. There is a need to ensure that the Federal presence in education should be supportive, helpful and effective. Testimony before the Committee by Mary Berry, Assistant Secretary for Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, highlighted the limitations of the Federal role and policy in education. It has developed, she said—> as a result of Congressional enactment and, to a limited extent, court decree. It has and must continue to be a secondary role—one that assists, not one that directs local and State governments, which have historically shouldered the primary responsibility for the public education of the very young, our college and university students, and the elderly.

Federal responsibility in education is especially focused on assisting State and local agencies to provide educational opportunities for the poor, the disadvantaged, the limited English-speaking and the handicapped. It is focused on ensuring that race, sex, age, national origin or handicapped status does not preclude access to and receipt of a quality education. Federal responsibility is also concerned with providing information and supporting research efforts which will advance education programs and learning opportunities. And, importantly, the Federal government has a responsibility to assist State and local education agencies in carrying out their statutory and State constitutional responsibilities.

The purposes outlined in the bill highlight the view of the Committee with respect to its intent in establishing the Department:

(1) To enable education to receive the appropriate emphasis at the Federal level. By establishing a Cabinet Department of Education, effective management and coordination of Federal programs can be substantially improved. The relatively low bureaucratic status of the Office of Education means that education receives less attention from the Cabinet and the President. The large number of existing Federal education programs has created management problems at the Federal, State, local, and institutional levels. The scattering of programs across Federal agencies has resulted in poor coordination in addition to multiple, duplicative and even conflicting regulations. Fragmentation at the Federal level has led to piecemeal approaches to education and education-related problems.

(2) To continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to ensuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities. Equal educational opportunity has been and must remain a major educational goal of the Federal government. The Federal government has acted to ensure equality of educational opportunity for every American regardless of race, sex, age, ethnic heritage, economic disadvantage, or handicapped condition:

Racial minorities.—Through compliance efforts, technical assistance, and financial assistance the Federal government has promoted racial desegregation.

Handicapped.—Through Public Law 94–142 (the Education for All Handicapped Children Act) and section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1972, the handicapped are guaranteed an appropriate education.

Language minorities.—Several Federal programs help to deal with the problems of children with limited English language skills.

Women.—Several Federal programs, and statutes such as the Women's Educational Equity Act, and title IX of the 1972 education amendments, are designed to help end sex discrimination.

Compensatory education.—Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act has provided compensatory education for the economically disadvantaged.

Access to higher education.—The Higher Education Amendments of 1972 began to give students from low-income families access to higher education.

Native Americans.—A number of Federal programs in the Office of Education make it possible for Indians, Alaska Natives, and Aleuts to receive adequate education services.

Migrant children.—The Federal Government provides a variety of services for migrant children.

As a result of these and other Federal initiatives—increased access to postsecondary education, bilingual education, and the education of all handicapped children—schools and colleges have dramatically increased their efforts to meet the educational needs of children and youth, particularly those from poor families and minority backgrounds.

S. 210 ensures the continuation and strong support of the Federal commitment to ensuring equal educational opportunities for every individual regardless of race, sex, age, ethnicity, economic disadvantage, or handicapping conditions. In conjunction with this responsibility, it establishes an Office for Civil Rights whose director would report directly to the Secretary. To emphasize the importance of civil rights compliance, the director's position is upgraded to an executive level IV.

(3) To supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public, and nonpublic educational institutions, education research institutions, community organizations, parents and students to improve the quality of education.

S. 210 recognizes that Federal education policies should be founded on the recognition that Federal, State, and local governments, tribal governments, public and nonpublic institutions, communities, parents, teachers, and students are the prime participants in education policies and practices. One of the major purposes of the Department will be to provide a mechanism to better assist these groups in their efforts to improve the quality of education.

The bill establishes an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council would conduct studies and make recommendations to the Secretary and to the President and, where appropriate, to the Congress for improving the intergovernmental system for developing and carrying out educational policies.

The Council is designed to supplement and complement State and local efforts to meet the Nation's education needs.

Specific responsibilities in the area of intergovernmental relations have been assigned to the Under Secretary who will be involved in the day-to-day policy-making and budgetary decisions within the Department.

(4) To encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the process relating to education, including the development and improvement of education programs and services. Not only would the Department of Education increase the visibility and attention given to education needs at the Federal level, but it is designed to increase the participation of families, communities, public and private schools, and State and local governments in this process.

A higher level of citizen participation in the educational decisionmaking process will serve to substantially increase public confidence in our educational system.

S. 210 recognizes the need for increased citizen involvement by providing for an effective structure through the proposed Office of Citizen, Parent, and Student Concern, and the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education, to ensure citizen involvement.

(5) To enable the Federal government to coordinate Federal education activities and programs more effectively through interagency cooperation, technical assistance, and evaluation of program effectiveness.

The establishment of the Department of Education will provide a mechanism to improve the coordination of Federal education programs. The current status of education in HEW and in other Federal departments has resulted in duplication and lack of coordination of the Federal education effort. It will provide for a streamlined organizational structure. Presently, education in HEW consists of at least 22 principal offices which either report to the Secretary of HEW, the Commissioner of Education, the Assistant Secretary of Education or to the Director of the National Institute of Education. The new Department would eliminate this duplication and, thereby, provide an opportunity for the Secretary of Education to coordinate education programs internally and with other Federal agencies. The statutory authorization of the Federal Interagency Committee on Education, with the Secretary of Education as its Chair, provides a vehicle to improve this coordination.

(6) To provide an improved organizational structure for Federal assistance in the support of basic and applied educational research and to implement the findings of such research at the local level.

The importance of education to the American people remains high. Yet, at the same time, concern over the lack of quality education is more and more evident. This is demonstrated by concern over declining student achievement, as measured by scholastic aptitude tests and decreased public confidence in the quality of education.

The bill provides a structure to assist in promoting the quality of and the relevance of education to individual needs, including the assurance of an adequate level of skill development and lifelong learning opportunities.

S. 210 provides for a consolidation of the Federal research functions with respect to educational improvement in the Department. With the establishment of the Office of Educational Research and Improvement, a wide range of disparate and overlapping programs will be brought together. The establishment of such an Office, headed by an Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement, will help support research efforts to improve teaching and learning.

(7) To supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, tribal, public and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated educational needs of such agencies, especially with respect to the simplification of the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, including the reduction of paperwork. In testimony before the Committee, Dr. A. Craig Phillips, President, Council of Chief State School Officers, stated, "Efficiency in delivering educational services would be greatly enhanced by creating a single agency so that responsibility for Federal action or inaction would be focused and not diffused . . . each agency, with its own rules and regulations, runs its own show, does its own thing, so to speak, with no single agency having the ultimate responsibility for the success or failure of it all." The establishment of the Department provides a mechanism to assist States and localities and educational institutions in their own educational policies and programs. By eliminating the many layers of bureaucracy within HEW and providing education with a single focus, the Secretary will be able to coordinate education activities within the Department and with other agencies and Departments in order to reduce duplication and unnecessary regulations.

IMPROVING THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSIBILITIES IN EDUCATION

PROBLEMS IN AMERICAN EDUCATION

The Committee's consideration of Department of Education legislation comes at a time when problems in American education are particularly serious.

While Americans continue to strongly believe in education as the key to success and fulfillment, their confidence in the capabilities of our educational institutions continues to fall. Recent polls continue to show that more than half of the public feels the quality of education in our schools is declining.

With the decline in confidence comes a decline in educational awareness and interest, and a drop-off of parent involvement in the schools.

This low level of confidence stems from a variety of sources. Achievement and college entrance test scores show a persistent, long decline over the last decade. More and more students are found to enter college with deficiencies in basic skills. Many colleges and universities are resorting to their own basic skills tests and brush-up courses.

Recent Federal studies have shown students are becoming more disillusioned with their public schools. Student absenteeism is on the rise. There is a shocking escalation in vandalism. A large number of teachers are either hurt or killed each year by violent students. The schools are losing their ability to be instruments of social change by this disillusionment.

School officials continue to be perplexed by the problem of reconciling declining enrollments and increasing costs. As the birth rate in the U.S. continues its steady downturn, inflation has driven up the cost of educating children. Instead of being able to save money where fewer students are attending school, a local school district today is actually paying more than before.

A disturbing result of this lack of confidence is the rebellion of many American taxpayers against taxes to finance public education. Bond issues are being defeated in record numbers. Many States are being forced to totally change their methods of financing public schools because of orders handed down by the courts. States and localities spend the greatest amount of their budgets—approximately 40 percent—for education.

These problems are serious, but there is no coordinated effort from the Federal level to help localities. While a Department of Education in and of itself could not solve education's tremendous problems, its primary purpose will be to supplement the States' and localities' efforts to deal with these problems.

A Federal Department of Education should not directly improve American education. It is not intended to do so, because that is really the province and duty of the States and localities. However, the Committee believes better organization and management of Federal education programs will better assist States and localities to improve education for students. In the long run, the level of confidence might rise and parents will take a more active role in helping their local school districts fulfill their job.

The Committee believes the Department of Education will have a positive, beneficial, indirect effect on improving American education and assisting parents and educators in the drive for educational improvement.

A LEGITIMATE FEDERAL ROLE

The Federal government has been involved in education for more than a century. It has reacted responsibly in meeting needs when States, localities, and private institutions had difficulty meeting them. The obvious examples are the passage of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act and the National Defense Education Act. In all cases, Congress has been careful to stick to the Constitutionally-backed principle that the Federal role is limited to supplementing, not supplanting, State and local prerogatives and rights in determining their individual educatonal program.

The Federal role in education, therefore, is a legitimate but restrained one. Today, there are important Federal policies and programs to aid education in the United States. They include:

Guaranteeing equal access to educational opportunities;

Conducting and disseminating comprehensive research into new ideas, trends, or problems in education;

Providing assistance to States and localities for educating the handicapped or disadvantaged;

Providing valuable complementary financial assistance to States and localities so as to insure the people are receiving a quality education; and Maintaining significant higher education loan and grant programs to open doors for all students desiring to continue their education beyond public school.

This role has grown from the $400 million budgeted for the U.S. Office of Education in 1953 when HEW was created, to more than $25 billion today, scattered about 40 different Federal agencies. The budget of the Education Division of HEW—which will make up the core of the new Department—alone exceeds $13 billion, which is more than the budgets of five existing Cabinet departments (State, Justice, Commerce, Interior, and Energy).

The Federal activity in supporting education is of such a sufficiently large magnitude and size as to justify independent Cabinet status. Its activities are given strong popular support by the American public. It is too important to be mismanaged or denigrated within the Federal government structure.

INSURING STATE AND LOCAL CONTROL

The Committee believes the establishment of the Department of Education will not adversely affect or diminish State, local, and private control of education in the United States. In fact, the Department is needed to insure that the Federal government remains a partner in the educational process, and that it does not supplant State and local rights in education.

From the birth of the United States through today, responsibility for education has rested primarily in the hands of State and local governments, public and nonpublic institutions. State and local control is institutionalized in this country. It is the key to the outstanding success of the American educational system, as compared with other industrial nations where education is centralized in national ministries. Local control is deeply imbedded in the fabric of American society, and cannot be changed through the simple act of giving education Cabinet status at the Federal level. At least 38 per cent of the budgets of State and local governments is spent for public education.

In its study of the operation of Federal education programs, the Committee has found an elaborate system of checks and balances to resist Federal encroachment in education. Continuously, education and State and local interests check and monitor proposed and existing rules, regulations, and data requirements. But, as programs continue to fragment and operate without direction or coordination, they threaten to destroy this delicate system of checks and balances. Educators, parents, and State and local governments cannot pinpoint the responsible Federal officials, and much accountability is lost. The end result will inevitably be more Federal encroachment. These educators, parents, and State and local governments will find a Department of Education more accountable, and more responsive to their needs .These checks and balances will operate more effectively if there is one, visible, and readily identifiable education position—the Secretaryship of Education. This community of people concerned about Federal education services will interact with one Cabinet secretary, instead of several lower-level officials as is now the case.

The Committee also senses a hidden danger in continuing to administer education programs side-by-side with health and welfare programs. Responsibility for health and welfare in the U.S. today rests primarily with the Federal government. HEW today accounts for most of the money spent by government for health and welfare services, such as Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and possibly in the near future, national health insurance. So the HEW administration faces conflicting mandates. Responsibilities in health and welfare are primarily national in scope and character, whereas those for education are primarily local. Given HEW's central role, there will inevitably be strong temptations within the Office of the Secretary—which makes most decisions for all of HEW—to impose a harder, or stiffer requirement on some education programs, instead of exhibiting more sensitivity towards the central role played by local educators. Representatives of State and local governments, education interests, and other public and nonpublic educational institutions often brand this mindset as the "HEW mentality." As health and welfare programs continue to expand dramatically—to more than half of the entire Federal budget within five years—and as the proportion of HEW's budget for education continues of necessity to rapidly decline, the national focus of HEW can only intensify.

In contrast to the Secretary of HEW, the Secretary of Education's one and only field—education—is not controlled or even primarily supported by the Federal government. The Secretary of Education will be forced to devote more attention to the real needs and problems of States and localities in education, for his constituents will hold most of the control and dollars in education. A new partnership will have to develop, and it will be one which recognizes that the Federal role is limited to supplementing and complementing local education.

Recognizing the importance of retaining local control of education in the United States, the Committee has written strong language in the legislation to protect the rights of States, their local school systems, and other instrumentalities of the States, public and nonpublic educational institutions to determine their own educational programs and policies.

Further, the Committee believes the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education created by the legislation will aid greatly in acting as still another outside check on the Department of Education for its sensitivity towards local control. The Council, made up primarily of State and local government and education representatives, will be an important voice in insuring the gains made through the establishment of the department for improving the efficiency of the Federal role and reducing Federal burdens are preserved and continued even further. Its power to review existing and proposed rules and regulations is particularly valuable in insuring State and local control of education.

BALANCED EDUCATION INTERESTS

The Committee has been careful, in the establishment of the Department of Education, to balance all educational interests and prevent domination by one over another.

In the new department, the assistant secretaries, Inspector General, General Counsel and Director of the Office for Civil Rights will all be on an equal footing with each other. Each position will be accorded the status of Executive Level IV.

In the present HEW set-up, there is little balance and much inconsistency. Offices serving elementary/secondary and higher education interests, for example, are scattered about the Office of Education. Most research offices are found at higher levels in the Education Division, mainly the office of the Assistant Secretary for Education. In all cases, some offices report to the Commissioner, at the lowest level, and some report to the Assistant Secretary, at a higher level.

S. 210 eliminates this confusion. No one interest will be able to dominate over another because their principal officers will all be equal in stature, and all will report to the single, top official—the Secretary of Education.

Further, the Committee notes that in terms of budget, elementary and secondary education will be roughly on a par with higher education. Each office will have about $5.5 billion in budget authority.

The Department of Education will serve all aspects of education, from elementary/secondary education, to higher and continuing education, to occupational, adult, and community education, to education of the handicapped, and to research of all areas of education. Thus the new Department will represent the entire spectrum of education.

BETTER INTERAGENCY COORDINATION

The Committee has made an effort to consolidate as many Federal education programs in the Department of Education as is practical and feasible at this time. The legislation as reported will consolidate 170 education programs.

However, interagency coordination of Federal education programs will be an important task of the new department and the Secretary of Education. The Committee believes better coordination will result through this reorganization.

Several education programs will remain with their parent agencies primarily because their basic mission, at this point in time, is tied more closely to that of the present agency than that of the new department. For example, the veterans education programs appear to be part of a comprehensive veterans service agency. The CETA program today is related more to public service employment than to education, although it does have educational components. Yet coordination between programs of the Department of Education and programs such as these will be vitally important if we are to get the most of our education dollar.

One important value of coordination is found in different agencies working together to share information and data so that duplicative reporting requirements could be eliminated.

Still another benefit from better coordination lies in the joint review by different agencies of requirements imposed by their rules and regulations on States, localities, and public and nonpublic institutions. Conflicting mandates could be eliminated and changed.

But to date, the many attempts at meaningful, successful coordination of Federal education programs have, for the most part, failed. The principal reason is that there is no one, high-level Federal official to take the lead role in coordination. The HEW Secretary has virtually no time to devote to meetings and conversations with fellow Cabinet officers for coordination of education programs. His or her hands are tied with health and welfare coordination. The Assistant Secretary for Education has attempted to make coordination work as the chair of the Federal Interagency Committee on Education, which is now authorized by executive order. But because of FICE's low status, only low-level bureaucrats represent the different agencies, and have little authority to make necessary changes and adjustments.

The best coordinating committee in the Federal government is the Cabinet. Cabinet secretaries regularly coordinate with one another because of their stature. They are on an equal par with one another in the Federal hierarchy. The two top education officials—the Assistant Secretary and the Commissioner—operate far below this high-level decision-making system and are not able to interact with Cabinet secretaries of other departments. In contrast, a Secretary of Education would become an equal partner in the nation's Cabinet, and would be in a far superior position to coordinate his programs with those of other secretaries. In addition, the President is often responsible for spurring coordination, done mainly through the Cabinet. But since the President does not have any contact with education officials, who, of course, do not sit at the Cabinet table, coordination of education programs is never considered. President Carter has often remarked that he has never heard education matters discussed at one of his Cabinet meetings.

Put simply, coordination fails when it is dropped in the hands of Federal officials below the policy-making level. The new Secretary of Education will be assigned the lead Federal role for coordinating education programs both within the Education Department, and with those of other Federal agencies. The legislation places coordination as one of the highest priorities in establishing the Department of Education. It specifically authorizes, by law, the Federal Interagency Committee on Education, and specifies that its members shall be from the policy level and the chairman shall be the Cabinet Secretary of Education. The Committee believes this will upgrade the effectiveness of coordination in the Federal government.

ALTERNATIVES

In studying Department of Education legislation, the Committee examined a number of alternatives to the establishment of a separate Cabinet department, none of which proved feasible or as beneficial and workable.

The Committee found widespread agreement that there are indeed serious management problems within both HEW and within the Education Division of HEW. But many disagree whether leaving education within HEW and reorganize that department internally or separating education completely would be the best course to follow.

Those who want education left within HEW argue in favor of the Department of Defense "subcabinet" model, where there would be subcabinet "secretaries" for health, for education, and for welfare under the HEW Secretary, or a Secretary of Human Resources. In DOD there is a Secretary of Defense, a Deputy Secretary, the office of the Secretary, and three subcabinet secretaries, for the Army, the Air Force, and the Navy.

The Committee believes there would be little improvement, if any, in reorganizing HEW by this model as opposed to establishing a separate Education Department. Perhaps the best explanation of the faults of such an arrangement was contained in a letter to the Vice President by Senators Magnuson, Ribicoff, and Pell in 1977:

> Patterning HEW after the DOD subcabinet model would be little more than a simple facelift, and in the end, do much harm to the overall Federal education effort. Such a reorganization would drastically increase and centralize the HEW Secretary's powers and duties. A Secretary of Education within HEW would only serve as an Administrator—not a policymaker.
> The education functions could even be further buried in unnecessary layers of bureaucracy. If the present Department of Defense organization is any indication of what we could expect, the Education "subsecretary" would probably be rele> gated to a lower position within HEW, under as many as nine assistant secretaries and a deputy secretary in the Office of the Secretary.

> Furthermore, the Education Division's budget would continue to be outnumbered, 18 to 1, by HEW's massive health and welfare program expenditures. The HEW Secretary, out of necessity, would continue to be preoccupied with pressing health and welfare concerns. Education would take a back seat, as it has always taken.

The Committee has found little reason to adminster education programs with those of health and welfare. The missions and focuses of the two differ significantly and they infrequently interact or coordinate with each other. The Committee has concluded that education should be removed from HEW.

Another alternative discussed on the floor of the Senate during debate on the bill (S. 991—95th Congress) to establish the Department of Education was to give education independent agency status, instead of Cabinet status. The Committee and the Senate rejected this proposal as inconsistent with the goal of elevating the status of education in the Federal government. Throughout the last 20 years, there has been a rise in the number of independent agencies. Today, there are 75 of them in operation. The important distinction is that education is basic to their work and the work of the 12 Cabinet departments. It is a function that cuts across all the others, and therefore deserves Cabinet rank. The biggest disadvantage of the independent agency model is that the head of the agency would not have enough stature, clout, and visibility to be the lead spokesperson for education in the Federal government. That official would also not be in a position to effectively coordinate scattered Federal education programs.

The Committee has given the Department of Education concept more than two years of careful examination and thorough study. It believes education deserves Cabinet rank, and will benefit greatly by becoming the Nation's 13th Cabinet department.

HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

Efforts to create a Cabinet-level Department of Education in the Federal Government have been ongoing, often sporadically, for the past 125 years.

In March 1867, Congress created a non-Cabinet Department of Education, primarily to collect statistics and other relevant data on the condition of American education. Unfortunately, this non-Cabinet agency never really got off the ground. Its budget was less than $15,000. It had less than 10 clerks and existed for only slightly more than 1 year. The Department was subsequently given bureau status and placed within the Department of the Interior for the next 70 years.

In 1939, the U.S. Office of Education was transferred from the Interior Department to the new Federal Security Agency created by President Franklin Roosevelt.

The Office of Education has remained in the Department of Health Education, and Welfare since its creation in 1953 under the Eisenhower administration.

From 1908 through 1951, more than 50 pieces of legislation to establish a separate, Cabinet-level Department of Education were introduced in Congress. In that time period, nearly 20 days of hearings were held on several bills, and at least six were actually reported to either the House or the Senate floor for final consideration. No action, however, was ever taken beyond the committee stage.

Yet, education advocates gave much effort and consideration in the first half of the 20th century to the creation of a separate Education Department. As far back as February 1910, then U.S. Commissioner of Education Elmor Brown, in testimony before a congressional committee on the issue, predicted:

> A time will be reached when the erection of such a department of the Government as this measure contemplates will be necessary to good administration.

In a December 1923 message to Congress, President Calvin Coolidge gave his support to the concept of the separate Department:

> Having in mind that education is peculiarly a local problem, and that it should always be pursued with the largest freedom of choice by students and parents, nevertheless, the Federal Government might well give the benefit of its counsel encouragment more freely in this direction. I do consider it a fundamental requirement of national activity which is worthy of a separate department and a place in the Cabinet.

And in 1931, the National Advisory Committee on Education recommended the creation of a Cabinet Department of Education:

> No bureau chief or head of a detached or independent establishment can give the equal access to the Chief Executive and that equality of approach to the heads of all departments concerned essential the effective total operation of education of education in government. The presence in the government of an officer of cabinet rank would insure that effective contribution of education which is essential to the future political and social welfare of the nation.

The Federal effort in education continued to grow dramatically after the creation of HEW in 1953. The budget for the Office of Education jumped from approximately $400 million then, to $4 billion during President Johnson's Great Society initiatives, to more than $10 billion today.

And as the Federal effort increased, so did calls in Congress for the creation of an Education Department separate from HEW. From 1953 to the present, more than 80 pieces of legislation were introduced in Congress and a large number of authoritative studies were conducted.

Under the Johnson administration, three separate task forces seriously studied the concept of a Cabinet Department of Education. The 1964 Task Force on Government Reorganization favored an Education Department:

> Because the schools have been afraid of Federal domination, the Government has never had a comprehensive policy for the advancement of education and research. But it is unrealistic to think we can protect the freedom of education by pretending to ignore it.

Also in 1964, a study team headed by then HEW Secretary John Gardner was split between creating an independent Office of Education at the Presidential level and creating a Cabinet department. Still another group, the Heineman task force, concluded in 1967 that a Department of Education was not necessary at that time.

Much attention was focused on the introduction of S. 100 (the Department of Education Act) in January 1965 by Senator Ribicoff. A former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Senator Ribicoff said a Department of Education was necessary because education was not receiving the attention it deserved in the burgeoning and increasingly unmanageable HEW Department. The Ribicoff bill has been reintroduced in every Congress since then.

The 1970's brought a renewed interest in the establishment of a Cabinet-level Department of Education. In the 1972 Presidential campaign, the Democratic candidate, Senator George McGovern, announced his support for giving education Cabinet status. In 1976, the Ford Foundation and the American Council on Education sponsored a landmark study on the issue, authored by Rufus Miles, Jr., formerly HEW director of administration throughout the 1960's. The Miles study gave strong backing to the creation of a Department of Education.

President Carter, throughout his 1976 campaign for the Presidency, pledged that in his proposed reorganization of the Federal Government, he would create a Department of Education.

In March 1977, Senator Ribicoff again introduced his legislation. This time, however, more than half of the members of the U.S. Senate joined him in cosponsoring the bill, S. 991. In the U.S. House of Representatives, nearly 30 different pieces of legislation to create a separate Department were also introduced in the 95th Congress.

Upon taking office, President Carter set up the President's reorganization project to study the Federal Government structure and recommend reorganization proposals. The project's education study team began work in April 1977. In late November 1977, they presented to the President for his review three options: (1) The creation of a Department of Education; (2) the creation of a Department of Education and Human Development; and (3) an uplifting of the status of the Education Division within HEW. The President decided in favor of the establishment of an Education Department, and announced his decision in his state of the Union Address in January 1978.

Meanwhile, the Committee on Governmental Affairs opened the first congressional hearings on Department of Education legislation in nearly 25 years. On October 12 and 13, 1977, prominent academic authorities, major national education organizations, and six former U.S. Commissioners of Education testified on the need for the Department.

The committee devoted 10 days of hearings to S. 991 and heard testimony from more than 100 witnesses. Committee markups on S. 991 were held July 11, 14 and 18, 1978. S. 991, the Department of Education Organization Act, was unanimously ordered reported by the Committee for full Senate consideration.

The House Committee on Government Operations gave much consideration to a Department of Education bill, H.R. 13343, introduced by Committee Chairman Rep. Jack Brooks, of Texas, on June 29, 1978.

Its Subcommittee on Legislation and National Security held five days of hearings on the bill (July 17, 20, 31, and August 1 and 2), and reported a clean bill, H.R. 13778, to the full Committee on August 8. By a vote of 27-15, the full Government Operations Committee ordered H.R. 13778 reported for full House consideration on August 15. The bill was granted an open rule and a two-hour general debate limitation by the House Rules Committee on September 14, 1978.

The following week, the Senate began nearly 10 hours of debate on S. 991, running over three separate days—September 19, 20, and 28. After four roll call votes, the Senate passed S. 991 on September 28, 1978, by a vote of 72-11.

The House bill, however, continued to be on the calendar, awaiting floor action. But in the end-of-session legislative logjam, the House bill could not be scheduled for full House floor consideration.

A week later, both President Carter and Vice President Mondale, along with House and Senate sponsors, pledged to renew their efforts to establish a Department of Education in the 96th Congress.

Senator Ribicoff introduced S. 210, on January 24, 1979. The Governmental Affairs Committee held three days of hearings, February 6-8, and ordered the bill reported March 14.

President Carter sent a special message to Congress on February 13, 1979, transmitting his proposed legislation to establish a Department of Education. On behalf of the Administration, Rep. Brooks introduced H.R. 2444 on February 27, and Senator Ribicoff introduced S. 510, the companion bill, on March 1.

TITLE I

Title I states the purposes for creating the Department of Education and the congressional findings. Some of the findings are:

Education is fundamental to the growth and achievement of the nation; there is a continual need to ensure equal access to education for all Americans; the primary responsibility for education is that of State, local and tribal governments, public and nonpublic institutions, communities, and families; the primary public responsibility for educaton is reserved respectively to the States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, and tribal governments; the dispersion of Federal education programs had led to fragmentation, duplication and inconsistent Federal education policies; State, local and tribal governments and public and nonpublic education institutions face problems as a result of a lack of coordination of education programs at the Federal level; the present organizational position of education at the Federal level hinders presidential and public focus on education issues; the importance of education is increasing due to the complexities of our society and the need to provide equal opportunities for citizens.

Some of the purposes of the Department are:

To enable education to receive appropriate emphasis at the Federal level; to continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to equal educational opportunity; to supplement and complement State, local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic institutions, including educational research institutions, community organizations, parents and students to improve educational utility and quality; to encourage parental and community involvement; to encourage the increased involvement of parents, students and the community in education; to enable the Federal government to coordinate education activities more effectively; to assist in the support of basic and applied educational research; to supplement and complete States, local, tribal, public and non-public agencies by providing support for their articulated needs, especially with respect to simplification of procedures for the dispersal of funds and the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens.

The bill further states the establishment of the Department of Education shall not increase the authority of the Federal government over education or diminish the responsibility for education which is reserved to the States, the local school systems, and other instrumentalities of the States, and tribal governments. It states the intention of Congress in establishing the Department is to protect the rights of State, local and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies, administration of programs, competency testing, and selection of curricula and program content as well as to strengthen and improve the control of such governments' and institutions' direction over their own educational programs and policies.

The Act does not require any particular organization at the State level of any programs transferred to the Department.

TITLE II

Title II establishes the Department. It creates the following offices and officers to perform respective functions. It provides for a Secretary (Level I) and an Under Secretary (Level III). In order to assure an intergovernmental perspective in the Department's overall activities the Under Secretary is assigned intergovernmental functions in addition to other duties. Title II also provide for the following offices which are headed and administered by Assistant Secretaries carrying the same titles: Office of Elementary and Secondary Education; Office of Postsecondary Education; Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services; Office of Occupational, Community and Adult Education; Office of Educational Research and Improvement.

There is also established in this section an Office for Civil Rights, to be administered by a Director (appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate), an Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children, to be administered by an Administrator, and two additional officers (one executive level IV Assistant Secretary position and one level V position) to perform staff functions. These functions would include: Public information; planning, evaluation, and policy development; congressional relations; administration and management; and public, parent, and student involvement. The staff functions to be performed by the one additional level IV officer would be planning, evaluation, and policy functions in addition to any other duties the Secretary may assign.

Each Assistant Secretary and the Director of the Office for Civil Rights would be compensated at the rate provided for executive level IV. The Administrator of the Office of Education for Overseas Dependents and the additional officer who is not an assistant secretary would be compensated at the rate provided for executive level V.

This title also provides for an Inspector General and a General Counsel. Each of these officers would be executive level IV's.

The Director of the Office for Civil Rights would be required to submit an annual report to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress on the Office's enforcement and compliance activities with respect to the civil rights laws relating to education.

The functions of the Department specified in Title II include chief duties of the principal officers as well as public information, congressional relations, planning and evaluation, administration and management, and monitoring parental and public prticipation.

This title also provides for the establishment of an Intergovernmental Advisory Council. The purpose of the Council is to make recommendations concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education. The Council consists of 25 members, including representatives of the general public, school officials and State, local and tribal governments. The Undersecretary would serve as an ex officio member of the Council. It would provide a forum for the development of intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education; make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs and education-related programs; promote better intergovernmental relations; and assess Federal policies and make recommendations to ensure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation, by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions. In addition, the Council would have discretionary authority to review existing and proposed rules or regulations of the Department and to recommend changes to make them more responsive to the needs and concerns of State, local and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

The Council would be composed of 24 the undersecretary and members to be appointed by the President. In making appointments, the President would consult with a wide variety of groups representing State and local, public interest and education groups and associations.

Lastly, this title elevates the existing Federal Interagency Committee on Education by giving it statutory authority and providing that the Secretary will be the chair. The purpose of FICE is to assist in the coordination of the procedures and actions of the Department and other Federal departments and agencies. It would consist of 17 members representing various agencies having educational interests.

TITLE III

This title provides for the transfer of agencies and functions. It transfers the following: All programs of the Education Division, the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Education, the Institute of Museum Services, the Office of Information and Resources for Handicapped Individuals, the Rehabilitation Services Administration (except for the developmental disabilities programs), the National Institute of Handicapped Research, the Interagency Committee on Handicapped Research, the Helen Keller Center for Deaf-Blind Youth and Adults and the National Council on the Handicapped. Also transferred are HEW's education functions for the Office for Civil Rights, for education advisory committees, the telecommunications-demonstrations grants, HEW's responsibilities for Gallaudet College, Howard University, the American Printing House for the Blind and the National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and the student loans for nurse training.

Transfers from other agencies include: Department of Defense's operation of overseas schools for dependents; National Science Foundation's science education programs, including programs for undergraduate instructional improvement, assistance and research in science education; Department of Justice's law enforcement student loans and grants; the Department of Housing and Urban Development's college housing program; the Department of Labor's migrant education program; and the Advisory Council on Education Statistics.

TITLE IV

This title contains the personnel provisions and general administrative authorities for the Secretary.

It provides for the appointment of personnel to the Department. it authorizes technical and professional employees for the Office of Educational Research and Improvement; 15 transitional employees; and a total of 63 positions at GS-16. 17 and 18. Of these, 42 new positions are authorized and 21 are continued.

Additionally, it provides for experts and consultants; provides for Congress to authorize an end strength for personnel for the Department; provides for authority of the Secretary to exercise the functions of the agencies and offices within the Department; and provides the Secretary authority to delegate functions to officers of the Department.

The bill prohibits reorganization of any structural entities established by statute within the Department. However, some flexibility is allowed for offices if procedures, which include specified notice requirements to appropriate congressional committees, are followed.

It redesignates reporting requirements to the Secretary which were required previously to the Commissioner of Education or the Assistant Secretary for Education. Subsequently, the Secretary is authorized to redelegate the reporting requirements to appropriate officers or employees within the Department.

Other provisions in this title authorize the Secretary to prescribe rules and regulations for the Department; to enter into contracts, grants, leases, cooperative agreements or other similar transactions with officials of Federal, public and private agencies; to provide technical assistance, advice and counsel to interested persons with respect to the Department's programs or functions; to establish, maintain, alter or discontinue regional or field offices; to maintain and acquire property; to provide for facilities at remote locations for employees and dependents of the Department; to use services and facilities of government agencies or instrumentalities with or without reimbursement; to acquire copyrights, patents or licenses, etc., if necessary; to accept gifts and bequests for the purpose of facilitating the work of the Department; and to establish a working capital fund.

In addition, the bill allows for the transfer of funds from one appropriation to another within the Department, but not to exceed 5% of the amount appropriated. It provides for a Seal of Office for the Department.

It also requires the Secretary to issue an annual report which includes an assessment of the plans for the Department. The report shall include a discussion of the effective management and coordination of functions of the Department as well as the recommendations concerning reduction of burdensome regulations and unnecessary duplication.

Finally, the title provides for the transfer of authorities under the General Education Provisions Act to the Department and authorizes sums to be appropriated for the Department.

TITLE V

Title V contains the transitional, savings and conforming provisions for the Department. Its main provisions are as follows:

Transfer and allocations of personnel and funds;

Effect on personnel. Maintains transferred employees in their present grade and compensation for one year;

Termination of operation of law of any existing office or agency all of whose functions are transferred;

Authorization of Director of Office of Management and Budget to make determinations of incidental transfers of people and funds relating to transferred programs;

Continuation of existing orders, proceedings, etc., made before the transfers by parent agencies until modified by the Secretary or the President;

Separability. (Preserves remainder of Act if any person or circumstance is held invalid);

Reference. (Ensures any other references which are applicable to the functions of the new Department refer to the Secretary or the Department);

Amendments to Defense Dependents' Education Act, including revision of membership of Advisory Council on Dependent's Education to broaden its representation to include parents and teachers;

Redesignation of HEW as Department of Health and Human Services.

TITLE VI

Title VI provides for the effective date of the Department and interim appointments. It provides for the effective date of the Department as 180 days after the Secretary takes the oath of office and allows for appointment of the principal officers and promulgation of regulations before the effective date.

SUMMARY OF HEARINGS

The Committee's consideration of legislation to create the Department of Education has spanned a two-year period, and has involved 13 days of hearings and testimony from more than 130 witnesses.

In the 95th Congress, the Committee conducted 10 days of hearings and heard testimony from more than 100 witnesses. Out of these 10 days, four were devoted to the general concept of a Department of Education and the remainder concerned the individual programs under consideration for transfer to the new department.

In the 96th Congress, the Committee conducted three days of hearings—February 6, 7, and 8, 1979. The 25 persons who testified discussed the general concept of the department, ways to insure continuing State and local control of education and improving intergovernmental relations, civil rights enforcement, the transfer of vocational rehabilitation programs, and the department's relationship to higher education and nonpublic education.

February 6: The lead-off witness was the Reverend Jesse Jackson, president of Operation PUSH (People United to Save Humanity). Rev. Jackson supported the department as a vehicle for underlining the importance of education in the United States, and for ensuring equal educational opportunity for all Americans.

Representatives of State and local organizations made up the second panel of witnesses. All made recommendations for improving the language of the legislation to protect State and local control of education. The National Governors Association, Education Commission of the States, National Conference of State Legislatures, and Chief State School Officers Council recommended that responsibility for intergovernmental relations be assigned to a high level officer in the department, preferably the Undersecretary of Education. The State and local groups also made several recommendations concerning the language of that section of the bill establishing the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education.

From the third panel, the Committee heard testimony in support of the Department of Education from State and local officials and black educators.

February 7: Senator Robert Morgan appeared before the Committee in opposition to S. 210. The Senator opposed the department in part because of possible domination by education organizations and of fear that it would lead to a national policy in education.

The second panel was made up of three organizations representing handicapped people and supporting the transfer of vocational rehabilitation programs to the new department. These individuals felt there would be increased coordination and cooperation between handicapped education and training programs of the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped in the U.S. Office of Education, and the Rehabilitation Services Administration in HEW, when consolidated together.

Of the three higher education organizations represented in panel three, two came before the Committee in support of the Education Department and of that provision of the legislation elevating the principal higher education official to assistant secretary rank. The Association of American Universities, however, preferred an internal reorganization of HEW rather than the creation of a separate department.

The last witness, Msgr. Paradis of the U.S. Catholic Conference, opposed the Department of Education because in part of the fear it would mean an enlarged Federal role in education, thereby possibly harming the pluralism of American education. Al Vandenbosch, Chairman of the Illinois Advisory Committee on Nonpublic Schools, told the Committee of his concern that the new department would not give adequate attention to the needs of private education.

February 8: Six members of the Administration testified in support of the Education Department. OMB Director McIntyre reiterated the President's commitment to the establishment of the Department. He suggested that the Senate bill contain: A prohibition against Federal control of education, more flexibility for the Secretary of Education in structuring the new Department, and the transfer of the migrant education program from the Department of Labor. Assistant Secretary for Education Mary Berry supported the Department because it would streamline the bureaucracy and provide a new emphasis on interagency coordination. U.S. Commissioner of Education Ernest Boyer said the new Department would improve administration of education programs, the quality of the staff, and make the bureaucracy more responsive and accountable. National Institute of Education Director, Patricia Albjerg Graham, said a Department of Education would consolidate widely-scattered educational research functions into a single office and under a single assistant secretary, thereby resulting in more efficient and targeted uses of research for use by States and locatities.

AREAS OF DISCUSSION

STATE AND LOCAL RESPONSIBILITIES FOR EDUCATION

The Committee carefully considered the question of whether the Department means Federal interference in or dominance of State and local policymaking. States and their political subdivisions have the constitutional right to determine their own education needs and policies. The bill reinforces this principle.

Amendments introduced last year by Senators Roth and Danforth addressed this concern. These amendments are contained in the present bill and have been further refined. Hearings held by the Committee this year focused particularly on the question of the effect of the establishment of the Department on education decisionmaking at the State and local level and on whether the establishment of the Department would mean more Federal control. Various groups testifying before the Committee specifically directed their comments to this area. Organizations testifying included the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National School Boards Association, the National Governor's Association, the Council of Chief State School Officers, the National Association of State Boards of Education, and the Education Commission of the States.

James McIntyre, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, commented that the Department would not change the Federal government's role in education. There has long been a tradition in the United States for local control of education. S. 210 recognizes this principle and recognizes that the Department's responsibility is to enforce existing laws and administer existing programs more effectively.

The creation of a Department of Education is supported by State and local groups who say they fear more Federal intrusion will be caused by the existing fragmented, uncoordinated, unaccountable, and low-level bureaucracy.

The hearings before the Committee highlighted this view that the establishment of the Department would, in effect, be a check on Federal encroachment. Mr. McIntyre stated:

> * * * with the establishment of such a Department and making the Secretary or the educational programs more accountable, along with the greater visibility * * * there would be greater and public debate about any type of either perceived or proposed changes in (the) Federal role.

Commissioner Boyer commented further:

> My best judgment is that in fact (the Department) will help protect against (encroachment). What I see now are decisions that are going on every day * * * regulations are being written * * * The lack of clarity and structure, the lack of clear and fixed accountability I think lead to the prospect of more entanglements and not less.

S. 210 underlines the unique relationship of the Federal government with States and localities in the area of education. The findings and purposes state clearly the intent of the Department with respect to the responsibilities of governmental entities and public and nonpublic agencies. The bill recognizes the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with States, localities, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities and families. It distinguishes responsibilities in our Federal system by stating the primary public responsibility for education is reserved respectively to the States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, and tribal governments. It recognizes that one of the chief purposes of the Department is to supplement and complement the efforts of States and localities and public and nonpublic institutions to improve the quality of education.

Section 103 of the bill specifically addresses the Committee's intention with respect to the establishment of the Department and the role of the Department with respect to State and local administration of education programs and policies. The Committee accepted an amendment introduced by Senator Roth which explicitly states the establishment of the Department "shall not increase the authority of the Federal Government over education or diminish the responsibility for education which is reserved to the States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, and tribal governments." Section 103 further clarifies the intent of the Congress with respect to establishing the Department to protect the "rights of State, local and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies and administration of programs, including but not limited to competency testing and selection of curricula and program content, and to strengthen and improve the control of such governments and institutions over their own educational programs and policies." Section 103 also ensures that the transfer of any programs to the Department does not require any particular organization of related programs or administrative networks at the state level.

Lucille Maurer, Chair of the Education Committee of the National Conference of State Legislatures, testified before the Committee on the importance for the Department to have a "strong institutional capacity to integrate its activities with education activities at the State and local level . . . it must be structured in a way that will guarantee day-to-day sensitivity to education policy-making . . . NCSL believes that this could be accomplished most effectively by charging the Under Secretary with responsibility for intergovernmental relations." Most State and local organizations agreed with this concept. The Committee responded to this suggestion by placing the responsibilities for the intergovernmental relations of the Department with the Under Secretary. The Committee has directed the Under Secretary to assure the Department carries out its functions in a manner which supplements and complements the education policies, programs and procedures of States and localities. The Under Secretary is also mandated to assure that appropriate officials within the Department consult with State and local education policy-makers concerning differences over education policies, programs and procedures and concerning the impact of the Department's rules and regulations on the States and localities.

S. 210 also includes an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The Council would act as a check on the Department of Education for the impact of its programs on States and localities.

The Council will advise the Secretary and the President on intergovernmental problems, progress, and concerns regarding education and intergovernmental relations.

Appointed to the Council by the President would be 24 nonpartisan representatives from State and local governments. State and local educational agencies, and private citizens, including citizens, students, and nonpublic institution representatives. The Under Secretary would also be a member.

The effectiveness of most Federal programs depends upon the delivery of the service of those programs at the State or local level where the Federal Government has limited authority. The widely-scattered education programs have caused confusion for State, local, and private agencies with respect to fragmentation and duplication at the Federal level. State agencies must deal with a myriad of agencies at the Federal level which often result in excessive amounts of paperwork requirements. The Council will provide a mechanism for involving those affected by the Department's policies to facilitate intergovernmental coordination.

The Council is not intended to be a buffer between the Secretary of Education and the President or Congress, nor is it expected to be involved in the day-to-day operations of the Department or in the annual budget process. Its role is advisory in helping the Department work toward the attainment of Federal, State, and local educational objectives. Its focus should be upon the long-term health of the intergovernmental system for managing education.

CITIZEN INVOLVEMENT

The Committee intends that citizen participation in the implementation of Federal education programs be a major function of the Department. S. 210 defines as one of the major functions of the Department "monitoring parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required by law, and encouraging the involvement of parents, students, and the public in the development and implementation of departmental programs."

Rev. Jesse Jackson's testimony before the Committee emphasized the necessity of parent, student and community involvement in the educational process:

> Presently education is too isolated from these elements and the result is obvious and devastating in numerous ways—from increased vandalism to lower academic achievement to the weakening of public financial support for public education * * * the recognition that parent, citizen and student involvement must play a major role and function in a new department for it to be successful and to rebuild the lost confidence in education is of vital importance.

In testimony before the committee last year, Dr. Carl Marburger, director of the National Committee for Citizens in Education, stated the importance of citizen participation for increasing confidence in schools and children's educational abilities. Lack of confidence in public schools is alarming. According to the National Center for Educational Statistics, the percentage of people with "hardly any confidence in people running education" has nearly doubled from 1973 to 1976. A 1976 Gallup survey found that 59 percent feel the quality of education is declining. Studies showing increasing declines in high school graduates' reading skills and SAT scores reinforce the lack of confidence in our schools. Even more alarming is that lack of confidence surfaced in the voting booth, where in 1975, 56 percent of all bond issues before the public were rejected.

Dr. Marburger cited the fact that educational research data demonstrates that when parents participate in school affairs their children do better in school. Also, when children observe their parents having an impact on the school, their self-image becomes more positive. Enhanced self-image has been linked to student achievement in many studies.

In sum, it appears that increased parent, student and citizen participation in the education process not only assists in increasing confidence in the schools, but also has an impact on the decline in student performance.

Already existing with respect to certain education laws are provisions for citizen participation, although there is no coherent policy governing the issue and no consistent enforcement of the provisions.

Student participation was also discussed in hearings before the Committee last year.

Lawrence Zaglaniczny, testifying for the Coalition of Independent College and University Students, and Joel Packer, legislative director of the National Student Lobby/National Student Association Coalition, suggested the need for a unit which would allow students to be consulted on decisions affecting them and to bring student ideas from across the Nation into the decisionmaking process of the Department.

S. 210 provides a mechanism where input can be provided from among citizens, including parents and students. As previously mentioned, one of the major functions of the Department will be to assess parental and public participation in the Department's programs.

The Committee suggests the Secretary establish an Office of Citizen, Parent and Student Concern to perform this public participation function. OMB Director McIntyre's testimony before the Committee supported such an office. This office could be the public's access point to the Department. It would be an effective means for ensuring citizen and parent participation in Federal educational programs and for rebuilding public confidence in education. If such an office were created, it would be responsible for monitoring the enforcement of parent and citizen participation provisions now in law and forming the public of opportunities to participate in educational policy determination. It could identify program authorities and funds that could or should be used to encourage parent involvement, and assess the effectiveness of parent involvement strategies.

Already existing within the Office of the Commissioner of Education are several offices of special concern (for example, offices for minorities, women, and the handicapped). These offices could be consolidated in this Office and benefit from the resulting coordination and increased visibility. A 1977 study by the Education Commission of the States concluded that Hispanics are consistently below their contemporaries in the rest of the Nation in reading, science, mathematics, social studies, and career development. A unit within this Office for Hispanic affairs could ensure that the Hispanic community is involved in matters of interest to it and could monitor and evaluate existing requirements to ensure that Hispanic participation occurs where the law warrants it.

Some of the specific functions this Office could perform would be the following:

(1) Analyze and assess programs administered by the Department to identify current parent, student, or citizen involvement responsibilities, and identify current materials technical assistance that can be used to increase their involvement;

(2) Assess, and report to the Secretary on the implementation of parent, student, or citizen involvement provisions in current law or proposed legislation, and make recommendations concerning the analysis and assessment of this involvement. The Office could be used by the Secretary as a vehicle for coordinating the numerous parent, student, or citizen appointments to departmental boards, commissions, or other panels;

(3) Provide assistance and consultative services to program staff in developing appropriate means for public involvement;

(4) Serve an ombudsman-type function by receiving and channeling for proper attention complaints, grievances, or other input from the public within the Department. This could make the Department aware of the needs of parents, students, and citizens and their involvement in the educational process;

(5) Serve as liaison with education advisory committees, the Federal Interagency Committee on Education, the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education, and the Under Secretary who has responsibility for intergovernmental affairs. Thus, stronger institutional community ties could be achieved by an effective mechanism responsible for achieving increased citizen involvement in the Department's programs and activities;

(6) Consult with various entities within the Department, such as the Office for Educational Research and Improvement, which are engaged in research or studies pertaining to parent, student, or citizen involvement in education; and

(7) Engage in the dissemination of valuable information on opportunities for parent, student, and citizen involvement in the Department's administration and policy development processes.

The Committee believes such an Office, if created, should be at a sufficiently high level in the Department to ensure its maximum usefulness and effect. Parent, student, and citizen involvement must cut across all functions of the Department for it to be successful and to build lost confidence in education.

OFFICE FOR CIVIL RIGHTS

A significant responsibility of the Department is to continue and improve the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities. S. 210 recognizes one of the purposes of the Department is to insure access by every individual to equal educational opportunities. The Department will assume responsibility for effectively carrying out the Nation's civil rights laws in education. Thus, the Secretary of Education will be accountable for the effective administration of existing civil rights laws.

S. 210 provides for the education components of HEW's Office for Civil Rights to be moved into the new Department. The education-related civil rights functions will be concerned with such provisions as title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (racial and ethnic discrimination); title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 (sex discrimination); section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (discrimination against the physically and mentally handicapped), Education of all Handicapped Children Act (P.L. 94-142); and Executive Order 11246 (employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, national origin), subject to the restrictions on use of appropriated funds such as is contained in section 420 of the General Education Provisions Act and sections 207, 208, and 209 of the 1979 Labor-HEW Appropriations bill.

The transfer of HEW's education-related civil rights responsibilities provided for under S. 21 is fully consistent with a mandate first expressed in title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that all Federal agencies assure nondiscrimination in the programs they administer. In order to implement this mandate effectively, organizational arrangements within the new Department will include:

The establishment of an Office for Civil Rights, independent of the Department's programs, whose director will report directly to the Secretary.

The designation of the Director of the office at an executive level IV position, and appointed by the President with Senate confirmation.

A requirement that the Director for Civil Rights be delegated authority by the Secretary for insuring that all civil rights laws are enforced in all program units of the new Department, and a prohibition against any redelegation of this authority to any official not directly responsible to the Director.

A requirement that the Director prepare and transmit directly an independent report to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress concerning the status of compliance with the civil rights laws relating to education. The report would include a statement concerning the Director's plans and recommendations to ensure improved enforcement of and continued compliance with the civil rights laws relating to education. The report would also identify problem areas in which more concerted enforcement efforts are needed. The plans and recommendations set forth in the report shall reflect the perceptions and views of the OCR Director and his or her staff.

These proposals will assure adherence to civil rights enforcement within the program units of the Department. Presently, the Director of HEW's Office for Civil Rights performs at a GS-18 level. This position is not Presidentially appointed, nor subject to Senate advice and consent. The increased status assigned to the function by S. 210 will (1) improve the ability to recruit high-level individuals; (2) demonstrate the importance the Federal Government places on civil rights enforcement in education; and (3) assure that the head of civil rights enforcement is accountable to the President and to Congress, as well as to the Secretary.

According to the Office of Management and Budget, the transfer of the education activities of HEW's Office of Civil Rights to the new Department would involve the transfer of approximately 1,023 OCR staff members. This raised some concern in the Committee that the Department of Health and Human Services might not have adequate staff remaining to carry out its responsibilities concerning civil rights enforcement in health and welfare areas. However, James McIntyre, Director of OMB, told the Committee last year that this transfer would actually enhance civil rights activities in the health and welfare areas: "These areas have been dwarfed by education within HEW; in the Department of Health and Welfare they would clearly be given the attention they deserve." (Letter of June 16, 1978, to Chairman Abraham Ribicoff by James T. McIntyre, Jr., Director, Office of Management and Budget.) In addition, Mr. McIntyre committed himself to review OCR's staffing needs, both within the new Department of Education and within the Department of Health and Human Services, within one year after the Department of Education's establishment in order "to be certain that the Office is capable of carrying out its mandate."

The Committee believes OCR should have adequate staff in the new Department as well as in the Department of Health and Human Services and expects OMB to report its finding of this review to the appropriate congressional committees when it is completed, but not later than 15 months after the Department's creation.

Another concern raised in the Committee's consideration of the OCR transfer had to do with data collection. The Committee recognizes that adequate data are essential to effective civil rights enforcement and does not intend anything in S. 210 to interfere with the enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, or any other nondiscrimination provision of Federal law or to abrogate or otherwise limit the timely collection of such information, or the securing of such records as are necessary to ensure the complete and uniform enforcement of these acts among the recipients of the Department's programs.

However, one of the Committee's objectives in establishing the new Department is to reduce the paperwork and red tape associated with Federal education programs, particularly as it burdens State, local and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions. Therefore, the Committee expects OCR data collection efforts to be consistent with the paperwork control role assigned the Federal Education Data Acquisitiion Council in the 1978 Education Amendments (Public Law 95-561). The Committee, mindful of section 400A(a)(6) of the General Education Provisions Act, feels the interests of both paperwork and civil rights enforcement are not incompatible. Additionally, the Committee expects the Director to consult with the Undersecretary to ensure that its data acquisition requests are informed by an intergovernmental perspective.

The Director should specifically identify any problem he or she has in collecting data in OCR's annual report to Congress, and suggest recommendations to solve these problems.

To provide OCR with a greater capacity to analyze the data it collects, the Director should be authorized to enter into contracts and other arrangements for audits, studies, analyses and other services with public agencies and with private persons, and to make such payments as may be necessary to carry out its compliance and enforcement functions.

The establishment of the Office for Civil Rights provides an opportunity to improve current procedures. The active involvement of those involved in ensuring the achievement of equal educational opportunities will be needed. Therefore, these individuals both in and out of government should be consulted to obtain suggestions for possible improvements that could be made during the transition.

The Committee expects the Office of Management and Budget will exercise oversight management authority to make certain the Department gives its civil rights responsibilities high priority, and expects the Department of Justice to exercise its supervisory powers regarding title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 under Executive Order 11247.

DEPARTMENT ROLE IN ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

S. 210 provides for the establishment within the new Department of an Office of Elementary and Secondary Education to be headed by an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education. The Committee estimates the new Office will administer almost $6 billion in education programs and have an estimated staff of 1,000. Since the 1960's, the primary Federal education effort has been to increase access to education and to help move toward equal education opportunity for all Americans. The Office of Elementary and Secondary Education will continue this effort by supplementing and complementing State and local government's efforts to eradicate educational inequity and to ensure economic productivity.

Although the lives of more than 48 million students in elementary and secondary day schools are touched by the programs established by the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the direction and administration of these programs is currently assigned to a number of officials buried within the U.S. Office of Education structure. There is little apparent effort by these officials to coordinate these programs to most effectively meet the needs of students in their communities and classrooms.

By placing these programs in the new Department under the jurisdiction of an Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education, the Committee believes that coordination for better delivery of Federal services to students, schools, and local education agencies can be achieved. A highly visible Assistant Secretary should be accessible and responsive to concerns of local school officials, teachers, parents, and students. An Assistant Secretary can better direct program officers in streamlining delivery and will have authority to institute delivery procedures which are responsive to the needs of local communities. An Assistant Secretary can oversee the total process of administering Federal education programs in such a way that the dollars Congress intends to be expended on actual program operation will go to schools where teaching and learning take place, rather than be squandered on administrative functions in the Federal and State bureaucracies.

DEPARTMENT ROLE IN POSTSECONDARY EDUCATION

American postsecondary education is a large and diverse enterprise enrolling more than 13 million students in some 3,000 colleges and universities, 4 million students in 1,000 community colleges and over 8,000 noncollegiate vocational postsecondary institutions. Higher education alone is almost a $50 billion a year enterprise which employs more than 600,000 instructional and research staff and 1.3 million administrative and support personnel. Of the estimated $22 billion Federal spending on education, approximately $9.6 billion is directed to postsecondary education.

The bill would establish an Office for Postsecondary Education, headed by an Assistant Secondary for Postsecondary Education, to assure that the needs and concerns of this major sector of education are represented at the highest levels of the Department of Education. The Office would have a staff of approximately 1,200 and have program spending authority in the approximate amount of $5.5 billion.

The need for a high-level spokesperson for higher education was discussed during the Committee's hearings. One fear raised by some in the higher education community was that a Department of Education might be dominated by elementary and secondary education interests. However, in terms of dollars expended, higher education and elementary/secondary interests are approximately the same. Both categories are funded near $5.5 billion. Dr. Sidney Marland, in testimony before the Committee stated: "While the higher education programs are fewer in number, they are substantially in parity in terms of dollars with elementary and secondary."

In response to a written question submitted by Senator Ribicoff to six former U.S. Commissioners of Education requesting suggestions for balancing elementary and secondary and higher education interests, the overwhelming response supported the need for an Assistant Secretary or Under Secretary for Postsecondary Education. Support for this position was also given by Robert L. Egbert, Dean, Teachers College, University of Nebraska at Lincoln, on behalf of the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education, the Dean's Network and Wilbur Cohen, Dean of the School of Education of the University of Michigan.

The Department will become the lead Federal agency in coordinating Federal policies and programs designed to improve postsecondary educational opportunities in the nation. Promoting equal access to postsecondary education should be accomplished primarily by maintaining direct grant and loan assistance programs for qualified and needy students. The Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education should also assure that basic educational opportunities grants and loans continue to be available to economically disadvantaged students who attend black colleges and universities or other institutions of their choice.

The Department will also be expected to assist the growth and development of a variety of academic programs and related services offered at our nation's public and private postsecondary institutions. Among the special programs requiring departmental attention and commitments are continuing education programs, lifelong learning library facilities and training programs associated with college instruction and research, counseling and community services, and institutional offerings relating to special services for individuals and groups underrepresented in higher education and certain technical and professional fields.

Characteristics of and changes in postsecondary education

Postsecondary education in this country is exceedingly diverse and extensive. Sectarian and private groups maintain and operate more than one-half of the nation's 3,000 colleges and universities. Institutions of higher education serve many purposes and many different clients. Each of these institutions should be able to choose and pursue its own course. Department officials should guard against carrying out any practices which have the impact of homogenizing or standardizing policies and services developed by State, local, or private higher education officials and their governing boards or of intruding into the areas central to the autonomy of such institutions.

Support for R. & D. at colleges and universities

Researchers and graduate students at colleges and universities are principal participants in the nation's basic research effort. Approximately two-thirds of all Federal R. & D. efforts, or about $3.6 billion (fiscal year 1979 OMB estimate), are obligated to colleges and universities. Federal agencies involved in basic research, such as NSF, NIH, the Departments of Defense and Energy, will continue their funding of the majority of the research dollars flowing to universities. S. 210 states specifically that no other mission-oriented research functions are transferred, other than those specifically provided for by the Act.

Although the majority of the funds for research, evaluation, policy studies, and demonstrations will undoubtedly remain outside the jurisdiction of the Office of Postsecondary Education, the Committee expects this Office to play a major role in assisting the research agenda for postsecondary education issues.

Role of the Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education

The Assistant Secretary and the Department itself is expected to be sensitive to the values of pluralism and diversity of higher education. The Assistant Secretary will establish continuing relationships with students, faculty, administrators, trustees, and other leaders to identify issues and problems and to make recommendations for improvements in Federal education programs affecting postsecondary education.

The Federal government is the source of one-third of the funding for higher education. One of the most persistent criticisms of Federal activity in the field of higher education is the overabundance of burdensome regulations. The Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education will be able to work with institutions of postsecondary education and with other Federal agencies and Departments in eliminating these burdensome regulations. The Committee foresees the Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education as the leading figure in helping postsecondary institutions strengthen and control the direction of their institutions over their own programs and policies.

The bulk of the Department's funds for postsecondary institutions will support the several major programs of student financial assistance, which are expected to be administered by the Office of the Assistant Secretary. Federal financial assistance to undergraduates has become a critical factor determining whether or not students from lower and middle income families attend a postsecondary institution. More than 82 percent of the Federal aid to postsecondary education includes grants and loans to students. Of this amount, 91 percent eventually goes to undergraduate institutions.

This act transfers four additional direct student aid programs to be grouped with approximately one dozen direct assistance programs administered by the Bureau of Student Financial Assistance in USEO. The Assistant Secretary will administer all "need-tested" Federal student assistance programs. "Need-tested" means that financial assistance grants and loans are awarded according to the student's or his or her family's ability to pay the cost of postsecondary instruction, and the price of education at a particular college or university.

The Assistant Secretary should consider the benefits associated with subsequent consolidation and coordination proposals. Effective coordination within this Office will greatly enlarge the capacity for simplifying the application process and increase the Federal ability to minimize the cost of defaulted loans by an improved collection process. Most importantly, a single agency will be able to analyze Federal student loan trends and problems in terms of long-run indebtedness to the student and his or her family and in terms of grants programs directed toward equal education opportunities at the postsecondary levels.

In addition, the Assistant Secretary will be responsible for coordination of Federal programs of financial assistance to students at the undergraduate, graduate, and professional levels. Such coordination is essential to reduce the complexity of information on the various specialized scholarship, fellowship, and loan programs conducted by other Federal agencies, and to provide to the greatest extent possible common conditions and criteria for eligibility, application, award, and administration.

The Committee recognizes the important role community and junior colleges have played in revitalizing and strengthening our American educational system. Today, more than four million students attend approximately 1200 community colleges. Because community colleges constitute a major segment of postsecondary education, the Committee suggests a director for community colleges have direct access to this Assistant Secretary.

OFFICE OF OCCUPATIONAL, ADULT AND COMMUNITY EDUCATION

The creation of the Office of Occupational, Adult and Community Education, headed by an Assistant Secretary, will provide needed vocational, adult, and community education assistance to the State and local programs, which constitute many times the magnitude of Federal efforts in this field. The Office's programs would have a fiscal 1980 authorization of over $781 million and would utilize a staff of approximately 300.

Today, over 15 million American children are involved in vocational education. Youth with more education who have less work experience are found to earn substantially more than their counterparts with less education. Adult literacy goes hand-in-hand with job stability and income continuity. Yet less than 5 percent of adults eligible for basic and secondary education receive serious services.

Because Americans have more leisure time due to advancing technology, education is needed to prepare our citizens for several jobs during their lifetimes. Studies show more than 75 percent of adults in the United States are interested in some form of continuing education. The elderly, and women, especially, seek new educational opportunities.

Schools increasingly are becoming important vehicles for the delivery of services to citizens by using valuable school facilities and costly educational services efficiently with related community services, yet less than 10 percent of the 16,000 American school districts have opened the schools to recreation and community services use. These schools which have opened their doors to the community are involving the people of that community in a total educational program. These schools offer recreation, public health, nutrition education, and other services to citizens of all ages and special services to the handicapped. They are put into round-the-clock service where local communities determine the needs that exist. Thus, community education programs and full use of schools by the community reduce taxpayer costs and promote increased community involvement.

The creation of this Office will provide the necessary administrative structure capable of assisting States and localities in delivering effective education and training and adult community services. The Office will be expected to be involved in perceiving changing trends in education and administering programs which prepare individuals for continuous education throughout their working lifetimes.

At the Federal level, this Office will effect a partnership between education programs with occupational outcomes in the Department of Education and manpower utilization programs with significant training components inthe Department of Labor. While youth education and employment constitute a primary focus of the work of this Office, preparation of adults and older Americans for access to education and work would be a priority mission as well.

At the State and local levels, this Office will provide programmatic assistance in achieving a blend of vocational, adult, and community education programs. This blend, in turn, will help to attract, retain, and serve private sector economic enterprise, to improve the quality of life and to coordinate education and work programs. With its focus on concrete skills and performances, the Office will promote exchanges between the schools and the larger community through provisions of grants to States and localities and by dissemination of the exemplary program currently under development or in operation.

The Office will also serve to promote confidence in and access to the schools by policymakers and the citizens of each community. With declining enrollments, surplus facilities, and strained resources affecting the long-term prospects for effective American education, the mission of this Office will be to chart the most cost-beneficial, community-responsive link between education and occupation, on the one hand, and school and community, on the other.

In light of the creation of this new Office, the existing functions of the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education would be located within it and the present Bureau would be abolished. Thus, the new Office would administer the programs now being administered by the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education. These would include programs relating to manpower training and development, technical training, and other functions concerned with vocational, occupational, adult, and continuing education. The community schools and community education programs presently located in the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education would be established prominently within the new Office to be concerned with school-community linkages and would administer and coordinate programs authorized or mandated in a wide range of associated legislation.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

S. 210 establishes an Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services within the Department. The Office would be headed by an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services, who would be one of the principal officers of the Department, reporting directly to the Secretary.

The bill transfers to the Department HEW's Office of Information and Resources for Handicapped Individuals; the Rehabilitation Services Administration (except the portion which administers the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Right Act); the National Institute of Handicapped Research; the Interagency Committee on Handicapped Research; the Helen Keller National Center for Deaf-Blind Youth and Adults; the National Council on the Handicapped; HEW's special institutional relationships with Gallaudet College, the National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and the American Printing House for the Blind; and, the Education Division's Bureau for the education and training of the handicapped.

Specifically transferred to the Office would be the functions of the Bureau for the Education of the Handicapped, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (except for the developmental disabilities program), the National Institute of Handicapped Research and the functions under the Randolph-Sheppard Act.

The new Office will not administer vocational rehabilitation services for Social Security disability beneficiaries, vocational rehabilitation services for Supplemental Security Income beneficiaries, or the developmental disability programs. This exception includes the beneficiary rehabilitation program funded through the Social Security Disability Insurance Trust Fund.

Frank G. Bowe, Director of the American Coalition of Citizens with Disabilities, testifying before the Committee for his association as well as the Council for Exceptional Children and the National Rehabilitation Association commented:

> This structure makes eminently good sense to us. It distinguishes clearly between goal-directed programs aimed at enhancing the potential of disabled persons and entitlement programs aimed at protecting the income and medical needs of persons who are dependent upon others for partial or full support.

The legislation provides for the transfer to the Office of the following functions:

Rehabilitation Services Administration (RSA)

The basic purpose of the vocational rehabilitation programs which RSA administers is to provide a comprehensive program of rehabilitative services for physically and mentally handicapped persons whose disability substantially impedes employment, but who can reasonably be expected to benefit in terms of employability from these vocational rehabilitation services.

The programs areas that are administered by RSA and are being transferred into the new Department include: Basic State grants ($760,472 million), innovation and expansion ($18 million), service projects ($17.328 million), research ($31 million), training ($30.5 million), and the Randolph-Sheppard vending facility program ($2.4 million). The program for deaf-blind services is also transferred ($2.5 million).

The largest program transferred is the basic state grants for rehabilitation services program. The Federal Government provides grants to States to provide the vocational rehabilitation services needed by handicapped individuals to enter into or return to the world of employment. The grants are used to provide the following services: Counseling, referral, placement, vocational and training services, interpreter and reader services, rehabilitation teaching, tools and equipment, transportation, technological aids, construction of rehabilitation facilities, and recruitment/training.

Bureau of Education for the Handicapped (BEH)

BEH is presently located in the Office of Education within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It is the principal agency for administering and carrying out programs and projects relating to the education and training of the handicapped as authorized by the Education of the Handicapped Act, and the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975. Its programs include: State assistance; special population programs; regional vocational, adult, and postsecondary programs; innovation and development; media and resource services; special adult education manpower development; and special studies.

S. 210 has provided for the consolidation of the Rehabilitation Services Administration and the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped within one Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services in the Department of Education.

The Committee realized an opportunity to make an organizational change in the existing fragmented programs that can initiate the development of a comprehensive Federal policy for the education of the handicapped.

There are several reasons the Committee believes the vocational rehabilitation programs administered by RSA should be joined with the programs administered by BEH in the Office of Special Education within the Department.

The first reason is that there is a natural relationship between the programs BEH and RSA administers. An examination of the foregoing program descriptions will indicate that both entities have as their common mission improving the ability of handicapped individuals to adapt to society. The Committee believes this relationship should be strengthened and that there should be a smooth transition between the general schooling a handicapped child obtains and the vocational education that same individuals receives when he or she decides what career or vocation to pursue.

The Committee also determined there is a significant overlap in the individuals served by BEH and RSA. Although BEH primarily educates children, a significant portion of its programing responsibilities trains adults who in turn train handicapped people. Programs such as the special education manpower development project illustrate this point. In addition, BEH administers programs which counsel the families of handicapped individuals. The regional vocational, adult, and postsecondary programs further illustrate the various age groups served by the programs BEH administers. On the other hand, RSA does not restrict itself to one age group either. It also trains nonhandicapped individuals of any age who in turn train handicapped individuals, and provides for model preschool programs for the handicapped.

The Committee believes placing vocational rehabilitation programs in the same office with programs concerned with the general education of the handicapped would—whether that general education is achieved through direct training of the handicapped or through the training of individuals to teach the handicapped—provide a continuum of habilitative services for the handicapped from birth through adulthood, as Senator Randolph, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on the Handicapped, has suggested in a letter to the Committee dated May 12, 1978.

Another reason the Committee favors placing vocational rehabilitation and the programs BEH administers in one office within the Department of Education is because the focus of these programs is educational. These programs emphasize training. Training is directly related to educational concerns. Moreover, their overall goal is to improve the ability of handicapped individuals to adapt to society. The Committee believes this goal is one which the Department of Education will be broad enough to encompass.

Further, it is the Committee's determination the goal of helping to make handicapped individuals become productive, to live with the same independence and dignity of nonhandicapped individuals, is much more compatible with the concerns of education than it is with health and welfare. Handicapped individuals have special needs for services and benefits regardless of income. Education has traditionally made as one of its goals the delivery of services and benefits regardless of incomes. Health and welfare, on the other hand, as they will exist in the Department of Health and Welfare, will deliver services and benefits on the basis of economic status. Thus the Committee believes the Department of Education will better be able to meet the needs of the handicapped as they relate to education.

Another factor the Committee took into consideration in coming to the conclusion the vocational rehabilitation programs should be transferred and joined with the programs administered by BEH is the significant number of States that presently administer their vocational rehabilitation programs from their educational agencies. This illustrates the proven compatibility between vocational rehabilitation and education.

While recognizing this existing compatability, it is not the intention of the Committee to mandate that any State must administer its vocational rehabilitation programs from its education agency. Therefore, the Committee added language to the bill which clearly states that nothing in the Act shall be construed to require any particular organizational structure of vocational rehabilitation at the State level.

During its deliberations on this issue the Committee learned of widespread support for the transfer of RSA and its consolidation with BEH in the Department from Senator Randolph, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on the Handicapped, the Council for Exceptional Children, the National Federation of the Blind, the American Coalition of Citizens with Disabilities (made up of 75 organizations), the National Rehabilitation Association and the State Admnistrators of Vocational Rehabilitation.

Dr. Bowe succinctly summed up support for this transfer:

> First, services for disabled people have suffered greatly from a severe lack of visibility, fragmented and deeply buried as these programs have been. There is every reason to believe the structure proposed by this Committee would make a truly historic breakthrough for disabled Americans, of whom there are currently fully 36 million. . . . Second, educational and rehabilitative services for disabled people have been poorly coordinated on the federal level. Just one week ago, HEW held the first meeting in ten years of the people responsible for coordinating special education, vocational education, and vocational rehabilitation programs for disabled youth and adults. The purpose of the meeting was to attempt to develop similar plans for service delivery within the three streams of service. That this occurred in 1979 speaks for itself.

In conclusion, the Committee believes the natural relationship which exists between the programs administered by RSA and those administered by BEH, and the relationship between both of these entities and the Office of Information and Resources for the Handicapped, merit their consolidation in one office. The Committee further believes the focus of these programs is more compatible with the goals of education than with health and welfare. Therefore, the Committee realized an opportunity to elevate the status, further the goals, and improve the coordination of the programs concerned with educating the handicapped by placing the Office of Information and Resources for the Handicapped, the Rehabilitation Services Administration, and the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped, along with other functions, in one Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE OVERSEAS DEPENDENTS SCHOOLS

The Committee recommends the transfer of the Department of Defense (DOD) overseas Dependents Schools system to the new Department of Education, and believes their inclusion in the Department will allow for the improvement of the education of their students.

As the American role in the world affairs grew after the Second World War, so did the need for providing a quality education for the dependents of military personnel stationed overseas. Today, there are 267 DOD dependents schools scattered across 24 different foreign countries serving approximately 135,000 students. Altogeher, the budget for the Schools is approximately $361 million, and the staff totals nearly 9,700.

Unfortunately, the DOD Schools have never been fully statutorily authorized, until the passage of the Defense Dependents Education Act, Title XIV of the Education Amendments of 1978. Up until now, the DOD Schools' authorization has been contained only in appropriations bills for the duration of their more than 30 years of "temporary" existence—normally less than a paragraph of legislative language. In the past, direction and guidance from the Congress has come in the form of detailed committee reports. The Defense Dependents Education Act takes effect on July 1, 1979.

The Committee believes more attention and oversight is needed for this important school system. The legislation establishes an Office of Education for Overseas Dependents, to be headed by a high-level Administrator who will report to the Secretary of Education. The schools will represent a major responsibility of the Department of Education. If located within the continental United States, the system would rank as the 12th largest among the nation's public school districts. The quality of the schools should improve and prosper in the new environment.

The Committee finds that the primary purpose and goals of the DOD schools are more in line with those of the Department of Education than the Department of Defense. Obviously, the primary mission of the Defense Department is not education. The schools' budgets are considered along with the rest of the DOD budget, where often there is a limited understanding of the intricacies of operating so large a school system. Although the immediate staff of the DOD schools is made up of professional educators, the top officials in DOD normally have little or no expertise in the field of education. The Department of Education, in contrast, will be the Federal agency having direct contact with American education.

The DOD schools do not prepare its students necessarily for any purposes related to the military. The schools are regular American public and elementary public schools, serving children from kindergarten through high school. The expertise and research findings in education will be more readily accessible in the Education, not the Defense Department.

Further, the DOD schools should not, by any means, be isolated from the rest of American education. Locating the schools in the Department of Education would help ease the transition of its students to the public schools in the continental United States. There is considerable movement between the DOD and the American public schools. Terms of duty for most military personnel average about 3 years overseas. It is both necessary and desirable to provide a sense of continuity for students going from one system to another. The Department of Education will be more attuned to the ever-changing trends in American education, and provide the Administrator of the overseas schools valuable assistance in sensing, adjusting, and responding to these trends.

The Committee expects the Secretary of Education will use his or her powers to make available to the schools the vast educational resources in the new Department. The Schools should be allowed to participate in a wide range of education programs not now open to them. The Secretary should make strong efforts to encourage the participation of the DOD Schools in vocational education programs, services for the education of the handicapped and gifted children, library and academic facilities improvement, research functions, and other programs which would benefit the Schools. The Secretary should also work closely with the Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents and the heads of other departments to provide adequate and quality pre-school education services for children at the Dependents Schools.

The transfer of the DOD schools should be conducted with a minimum of disruption. The legislation provides for a 3-year "phase-in" period, during which time the Secretary is required to develop a comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer. The continued efficient operation of the schools is very important, and will require a careful analysis before the transfer plan is actually designed and executed. During the transition period, the Committee is directing the Secretary of Education and the Secretary of Defense to work closely and harmoniously to assure a smooth transfer of the schools and avoid any disruption to or deterioration of the education programs conducted in the schools. Section 505(a) insures the agreements between the schools' present administration and the Armed Forces in existence at the time the Department of Education is established shall remain in effect until new agreements are negotiated as part of the planned transfer.

The Committee intends that all benefits presently enjoyed by personnel of the overseas schools be unaffected and retained through the transfer of the schools to the Department of Education. Section 401(g) of the legislation specifically provides that the U.S. government shall continue to classify overseas personnel as the civilian component of any status of forces agreements between the U.S. and a foreign country or international organization. The Committee intends that this apply to all agreements giving special treatment or status to personnel of the overseas schools, whether they are defined specifically as the "civilian component" in that agreement or in a similar manner. Further, section 421(a)(2) provides that the overseas personnel shall continue to be treated by the Defense Department as their employees so that they may continue to receive any and all benefits available to them at the present time. The Committee believes these important benefits, such as access to commissaries, exchanges and other military-related facilities, can be continued with no disruption or inconvenience to either the overseas personnel or the Department of Defense.

The Committee believes the reorganization of the DOD schools which is currently underway should continue, and should not be disrupted during the transition period.

Increasing parent and citizen involvement

The Committee is concerned with the disturbing lack of effective and meaningful parent, citizen, and student involvement in the operation and policy-making of the overseas dependents education system.

Final authority for the Dependents Schools—ranking as the 12th largest American public school system—rests with one individual, the Director of the Office of Dependents' Education in DOD. The Committee believes this arrangement runs counter to the American tradition of setting educational policies and programs through boards made up of elected parents, citizens, students, and educators. In the transfer of the Dependents Schools to the Department of Education, the Committee suggests the Secretary of Education take immediate steps to increase participation in the schools by members of the military community and their families, and by professional educators and administrators.

Section 302(c) of the legislation requires the Secretary of Education, in developing a plan for transferring the Dependent Schools to the new department, to also include recommendations for increasing the participation of parents, students, teachers, and administrators in the administration of the schools while retaining links to the military. The Committee recommends the Secretary and the Advisory Council on Dependents Education consider the establishment of a governing board for the Dependents Education System at the federal level, with boards also at the local and base level. The Committee notes there already exists such a framework and structure, but in an advisory capacity only. To advise the school principals at the local level, there exists Local Community School Advisory Councils. From there, District Advisory Councils advise District Superintendents, Regional Advisory Councils (Atlantic, Pacific, and European) advise the Regional Directors, and finally, at the national level, the Advisory Council on Dependents Education will advise the Director of the Dependents Schools. The obvious shortcoming of these councils, however, is that their success depends totally on the receptiveness of the officials being advised. These panels must be given a large measure of authority over educational programs and policies to be effective, in much the same way as school boards on the local, regional, and State levels operate here in the continental United States.

The governing board established for the Dependents Schools should be given total responsibility for setting all policies for the schools. The Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents provided for in S. 210 would report to such a board, as a school superintendent in the U.S. reports to the local board of education. For the governing board to work properly, a number of details would have to be worked out and thoroughly investigated, such as the location and meeting place for the board, method for selecting board members, authority over local school boards and relationships between the two, and the relationship between the board and the Department of Education. The Committee expects the Secretary and the Advisory Council on Dependents Education, in consultation with overseas parents, students, and teachers, will give careful consideration to such a concept.

To insure the Dependents Schools receive priority attention in the Department of Education, the Committee is directing in the legislation that the Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents report to the Secretary. This will also increase the accountability of the schools' administration and facilitate actions to increase participation.

The Committee feels the transfer of the DOD schools to the Department of Education will broaden the scope of the Department, improve the quality of the schools, and most importantly, improve the quality of education for students who attend the schools. The Federal government has a clear obligation to provide an education of equal or superior quality for the dependents of military personnel.

SCIENCE EDUCATION

The Department will assume the administration of a number of science education programs presently located within the Science Education Directorate of the National Science Foundation (NSF).

S. 210 insures appropriate placement for the science education programs by transferring them specifically and intact to the Office of Educational Research and Improvement. Within such an organizational structure the science and technology programs would constitute approximately one-fourth of the R. & D. programs categorized and administered by this Office. The Committee expects science education to be both a visible and substantial component in the new Department, as well as a special entity which will complement science and technology initiatives supported by the NSF and other science and research agencies.

Transfer of these programs will enable the Department to take an active role in assisting the improvements of the quality of science teaching in schools and in undergraduate postsecondary institutions, as well as in improving public understanding and science literacy among the general public. The Department will assume primary responsibility, not only for the specific science programs transferred, but for the conduct of studies, surveys, and evaluations relating to the quality of science teaching and learning and improved understanding of science. Dissemination of science curricular materials and teaching practices should become a departmental priority.

A science education unit in the Department is expected to assist in enhancing the quality of school science programs and the quality of teaching unnecessary overlap between education programs supported by NSF and the authorities administered by HEW's Education Division.

The Education Division supports projects worth millions of dollars which deal with science education and curricular development (for example, biomedical education, environmental education, metric education, ESEA and Emergency School Aid science and math projects) and supports research relating to teaching subjects including science, math, and the use of instructional technologies. Thus, apart from the NSF science education programs, the Department of Education will administer hundreds of millions of dollars for science-related and mathematics programs. The substantive quality of science and math curricular research and development programs will be assured by the direct involvement and assistance of scientists and science educators who will serve as staff, reviewers and consultants. These programs, along with those of science education, are expected to give strong impetus to science education in the new Department.

Declines in science achievement over the past decade have required renewed attention. Achievement in science, as measured by various national surveys and standardized tests, has steadily declined. Many science and mathematics teachers admit to having been inadequately trained. According to the recent report from the National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP), high school "youths continue their downward trend in science despite the ever-growing demands of a technological society."

A strong commitment to science education will necessitate the placement and support for a strong and visible organizational entity in the Department which concentrates attention and resources on science improvement. This unit will be located within the Office of Educational Research and Improvement and parallel other major efforts which focus on basic and applied research, postsecondary education improvement, and other program units which report directly to the Assistant Secretary for Research and Improvement.

The NSF programs transferred in the legislation represent approximately $58.7 million out of the entire $80 million fiscal year 1979 plan for the Science Education Directorate in NSF and will require the transfer of no more than 90 personnel.

S. 210, as reported, is consistent with the President's proposal for reorganization. Only those programs aimed primarily at students, the general public, and teachers in the elementary and secondary and undergraduate institutions will be transferred to the new Department. The programs which would remain at NSF include those aimed at recruiting and training scientific researchers, programs requiring direct participation of scientists, and those which provide highly technical science information and assistance to citizen groups and to scientists. The programs transferred are the following:

Teacher training.—These programs are primarily designed to assist in improving and updating the quality of experienced elementary and secondary school or teachers at all levels. Since the early 1950's, these workshops and institute-type programs have been extremely popular among teachers, and in 1979 some 18,000 persons will participate.

Student oriented.—These programs are directed at identifying, teaching, and involving (in laboratory and clinical settings) some of the Nation's most talented high school students. In 1979, some 5,000 students will participate in these programs, many of whom will be minorities and females who will receive encouragement to enter scientific fields.

Institutional support.—These programs provide funds for improving institutional facilities and equipment, primarily at 2- and 4-year colleges, including undergraduate colleges which serve blacks and other minority groups.

Science education research and development.—These programs emphasize assistance in developing innovative curricula and technologies and designing science programs for all youths and adults, including those created exclusively for the gifted and talented in preschools, schools, and undergraduate institutions, or in nontraditional settings.

Public understanding of science programs.—Certain programs that are designed to assist in improving the public's understanding of scientific principles and technological content which may be involved in broader public policy and political issues will remain in NSF.

The transfer of the existing science education programs from the NSF to the Department will not have the effect of amending Public Law 81–507, authorizing the creation of the National Science Foundation and the Science Education Directorate. The NSF will continue to assume responsibility for strengthening scientific research and may initiate new scientific programs and projects which relate to personnel and institutional development and public understanding, when they draw upon the scientific expertise of that agency.

Science programs dependent upon a research environment, educational efforts dependent upon the direct involvement and interaction of scientists and science education programs designed for practitioners of science, or for the public requiring scientific and technical information and information translations, should continue to function with the administrative structure of NSF.

The NSF will maintain its primary educational function by continuing its support for fellowships and traineeships closely associated with graduate and postdoctoral research programs. NSF will also retain responsibility for special graduate fellowships and traineeships for students and faculty in minority institutions and for other efforts which provide support for underrepresented individuals, that is, ethnic minorities, women, handicapped persons, who have the desire and potential to enter scientific and research careers, or to enroll in graduate schools, colleges, and universities to pursue scientific careers. The National Science Foundation will also retain its responsibility for sponsoring basic fundamental research that may relate to education and to human growth and development. Studies in cognitive development, linguistics, and those relating to various social science disciplines will continue to be promoted and funded by the appropriate Directorates within the NSF.

Project activities under the science and society program will continue to be administered in the Foundation, with the exception of certain activities relating to public understanding, which will be a shared responsibility among a number of Federal agencies. The science and society program is intended to bring about greater understanding and improvement to the relationship between the scientific and technological communities and to the larger society. Improving the public's understanding of complex science and technological principles and information often requires the direct involvement and participation of top scientific and technical expertise. As a result, the Committee feels the NSF should not be discharged from this set of activities. Much of this effort helps to assure the involvement of the research and academic communities in contemporary debates on public and social policy. This effort provides important assistance to public-interest groups seeking scientific and technical expertise and also examines ethical and value issues in science and technology.

The Committee expects the Secretary to work closely with and draw upon the advanced knowledge and technical expertise in the NSF and in other scientific agencies, institutions, and associations. It should also strive to improve contacts between the scientific and nonscientific communities and between scientists and professional educators. Assurances in these directions will ultimately lead to improved public undertanding of and appreciation for science.

NSF will continue to support basic or fundamental research relating to education and to initiate proposals for research, training, or development projects relating to education when it feels such an activity is in the national interest and within the scope of its mission and agency mandate "to promote the progress of science."

The Committee urges the Secretary to make extensive use of scientific talent among the academic and university communities. Limitations of salary and expense (S.&E.) funds often preclude more direct outside participation in planning, budgeting, and evaluation activities. Nevertheless, the Committee feels strongly that immediate steps and plans need to be developed by the Secretary to assure the direct and continued involvement of the scientific community in the development of general science-related policies, in specific tasks associated with the evaluation of competitive grant and contract applications, and in the monitoring of ongoing science education projects, institutes, and dissemination efforts.

The Secretary should make use of provisions of this Act which govern appointments and compensation with respect to scientific and technical personnel. A major factor for the success and influence of NSF's science education efforts has been attributed to its strong commitment to the steady rotation of scientists from the field into the agency. Continued use of noncompetitive appointments should be based on highly selective skills or knowledge which may not be available in the agency as well as a general desire to have notable and competent science educators functioning within the agency at all times. Technical assistance to other Federal education program managers and project officers and to other interested groups or individuals concerning science education should be a significant departmental function apart from the funding of programs. Transfer of personnel from NSF to the Department should help to build the nucleus of a cadre of expert science educators. An immediate review of staffing requirements for the science education activities should be undertaken.

Finally, the Secretary should also make note of the Committee's concern for the organizational placement of the science programs being transferred. The Committee recommends that a supergrade-level person with a strong science background should directly supervise the science program activities.

HUD COLLEGE HOUSING PROGRAM

The Committee recommends the transfer of the college housing program, presently administered by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

The college housing program was created by title IV of the Housing Act of 1950, as amended, to assist higher educational institutions, through long-term Federal loans, in the construction, expansion, or rehabilitation of dormitories, dining halls, student unions, infirmaries, and other campus housing. The program presently operates on a revolving fund, estimated to be aproximately $110 million this year. Interest rates for the loans average about 3 percent. More than $3 billion in loans to publicly operated postsecondary educational institutions are still outstanding. For the private institutions participating in the program, nearly $2 billion are outstanding.

Generally, the Committee believes the transfer of the HUD college housing program would allow for the development of a consolidated assistance program for construction of higher education facilities. There already exists in the Office of Education the higher education facilities loan and insurance fund, the purpose of which falls into line closely with the college housing program.

The Committee further believes it will be important that the present high level of efficiency of operation of the program not be disturbed by the transfer. HUD now uses complex legal agreements and procedures for operating the program, and their transfer should be carried out with a minimum of disruption and burdensome changes. The Committee recommends the Department of Education continue to use the services of the Federal Reserve Bank as the fiscal agent for the Department. Coordination between the Department and the FRB should be close and strong during and after the transition period.

FEDERAL INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

There is a strong need for effective coordinatin of education programs in the Federal government. The Committee believes a useful tool for the Secretary of Education in achieving this coordination will be the Federal Interagency Committee on Education (FICE).

FICE was first created by an Executive order issued by President Johnson in October 1964, and later revised and updated in another issued by President Nixon in January 1974. In both cases, the FICE was created because:

> Continued close coordination of Federal educational activities will facilitate the resolution of common problems and otherwise promote effective planning and management [education] activities.

Through the creation of the Department of Education, the Congress will be taking a significant step toward consolidating a widely scattered, badly fragmented Federal education effort. Although the Department will, as provided for in S. 210, consolidate more than 170 education programs, there will still be other education programs in various Federal agencies. Coordination of these programs with those of the Department of Education will be an important function of the Secretary.

One such example would be in the area of international education. Increasing global interdependence hastened by exchange of ideas, people, technology, natural resources, and culture make international education an increasing part of the learning experience of all Americans. The establishment of FICE will provide an excellent vehicle for the Secretary of Education, who has primary responsibility for coordinating external activities in education and cultural affairs to propose and coordinate strategies for improving programs in international education.

For higher education, the importance of a strong FICE increases. As Charles Saunders of the American Council on Education told the Committee:

> The higher education community has had more interest in other programs elsewhere in the government than in the [HEW] Education Division. But at the same time, the need to coordinate the relationship across the government still remains very acute.

At the present time, the existing nonstatutory FICE does not function at the Secretarial level. The chairperson of FICE is the Assistant Secretary of Education. Agency representatives to the committee are often not high-ranking officials, which detracts from its effectiveness.

S. 210 elevates and upgrades FICE and gives it new prominence. The legislation mandates the chairperson shall be the Secretary of Education, thereby giving the committee Cabinet-level leadership.

The bill names some of the key Federal agencies which must designate representatives to FICE. In addition, the Secretary can appoint other members to serve on FICE or to participate in its meetings. Other participants or members might include ACTION, International Communication Agency, and the Smithsonian Institution. The language stipulates that these individuals must be from high-ranking, policy-level positions. The Committee believes this is crucial, as these members will be in a position to better implement FICE's recommendations in their specific agencies.

The legislation provides statutorily for FICE. The Committee which is charged with studying the Federal government's operation and structure with an eye towards efficiency, believes coordination will be one of the single most important tasks of the Secretary of Education. A job this important should not be left tc Executive order authority, for priorities and needs change with the coming and going of different administrations. With S. 210, coordination of Federal education programs becomes a congressionally mandated priority and function.

The conduct of various studies, surveys, and evaluations relating to the overall impact and influence of Federal educational activities are also important initiatives for the Secretary to direct. The Committee believes the Secretary should make great use of the FICE in conducting such studies to facilitate interagency cooperation.

RESEARCH AND IMPROVEMENT IN EDUCATION

Patricia Albjerg Graham, Director of the National Institute of Education, in testimony before the Committee commented on the Federal government's unique role to "support sustained, disciplined, basic and applied research into the processes of teaching and learning, the operations of our school system, and the problems of children and adults trying to take advantage of what the schools have to offer."

The Committee has paid particular attention to the need to provide the new Department with a strong base for its research and improvement activities. The bill establishes an Office of Educational Research and Improvement (ERI), headed by an Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement.

The Department's assistance in the development of new knowledge about the educational process, and encouragement of its use in improving education, will be a major activity of the Department of Education. Both the Administration and organizations representing educational researchers have endorsed the importance of providing for a strong research component within the new Department.

Dr. Mary Berry, in testimony before the Committee stated:

> Perhaps the most overlooked and understated concern in the debate surrounding creation of a Cabinet-level Department of Education is research. One result likely to occur with the enactment of legislation establishing a Department would be the much needed consolidation of the Federal research functions in the Department. Indeed, the establishment of a totally new Office for Educational Research and Improvement will enable the Federal Government to bring > together a wide range of disparate and overlapping programs. Although research on education has been helpful, it has not yet had as substantial impact on teaching and learning as it should.

The American Educational Research Association stressed that—> strategic placement and status will allow the Education Research and Improvement unit to more effectively share its knowledge resources throughout the Federal Government, among different levels of education governance, and with the private sector.

In total, an estimated $700 million is spent on statistical analysis, research, development, demonstration, dissemination, and evaluation efforts in the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the National Science Foundation Science Education Directorate, and the other programs that would be transferred to the new Department by S. 210.

Support for research and improvement activities are the mechanisms through which the Federal Government can least intrusively and most productively increase the capacities of State and local and private educational agencies, other levels of governments, private organizations, and individuals to improve the quality of American education.

Federal research and improvement activities: An overview

Given the importance of the Federal government's support for research in education, the Committee's attention focused on numerous Federal agencies conducting educational research. The National Institute of Education (NIE) has the mandate to both conduct and coordinate educational research at all levels. The National Science Foundation, particularly through its science education programs, directs large amounts of money toward educational research, development, and improvement of science education. The Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education (FIPSE) supports innovative projects in the area of postsecondary education, and the National Center for Educational Statistics (NCES) collects data, and conducts a wide range of research surveys on all aspects of education. The Office of Education administers the majority of research-related program activities in the Education Division, including operating research programs in vocational and handicapped education programs.

The Committee believes a much more rational organizational structure should be designed for the plethora of Federal efforts to support analysis, investigation, and improvement of our educational system. Moreover, the research and improvement activities of the Federal Government need to be more effective and efficiently managed.

An Office of Educational Research and Improvement (ERI)

S. 210 establishes an Office for Educational Research and Improvement, in order to correct problems with, and build on the strengths of, current research and improvement activities at the Federal level. The Office will be headed by an Assistant Secretary (executive level IV).

In establishing an Office of ERI, the Committee is both certifying the role and elevating the priority of Federal R. & D. activities which are designed to improve education, public understanding, and the capacities of educational institutions at all levels.

Mr. McIntyre, in his statement to the Committee, specified the primary components of the Office:

> The major program components of this Office will be the National Institute of Education, the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education, the National Center for Education Statistics and certain science education programs from the National Science Foundation. (Feb. 8, 1979.)

Chairman Ribicoff expressed similar intent in his S. 210 introductory statement before the Senate (Congressional Record, Jan. 2, 1979, p. S578). Although not all of these units are transferred explicitly to the Office of ERI, it is intended that they will be the major units administered by the Office.

The new Office will serve as an integrating and coordinating mechanism for supporting the effectiveness of a wide range of research, development, demonstration, dissemination, evaluation, analytical, and other activities facilitating change. The Committee is convinced of the importance of "buffering" the basic and applied research functions of the Office, and suggests that this issue be considered within the context of the creation of the new Office and Assistant Secretary position.

The Committee considered several alternative ways of reorganizing these functions. (Refer to S. Rept. 95–1078 on S. 991 for a discussion of the various options for organization of the Office as well as the advisory and policy councils associated with the entities transferred.)

This Committee expects the Labor and Human Resources Committee to direct its attention to the reorganization of educational research and improvement functions when hearings to extend FIPSE, NIE, science education, and telecommunications program authorizations are held this year as part of the higher education reauthorization process. At that time the possible relationships between the programs transferred by this legislation to the Office for Educational Research and Improvement and the overall mission of the Office can be considered further.

Criteria for assigning research and improvement functions

The bill provides authority for the Secretary to assign and reassign existing programs among units of the new Department including the research and improvement unit. The Committee does not, however, intend that all demonstration, development, and dissemination activities be assigned to the Office for Educational Research and Improvement. Operating program units should retain some capacity for data collection, evaluation, and dissemination of exemplary programs. Indeed, their present capabilities to carry out these functions should be strengthened.

The Committee expects the Secretary and Assistant Secretary to work with appropriate authorizing committees and subcommittees to assure that:

> Peer review and competitive processes guide the allocation of most research funds;
>
> Nearly all of the fiscal resources of the Office are allocated for research and improvement efforts conducted by qualified individuals and organizations outside of the Federal Government (through grants, contracts, and cooperative agreements);

A sufficient number of career and short-term scientific, professional, and technical personnel are recruited by the excepted service authorities in order to facilitate flexibilty and attract the best qualified persons;

Sufficient emphasis is placed on developing ways to improve the dissemination of the results of research and improvement activities; and

Reports and statements based on the research efforts funded by the Office are reported without delay.

The organizational structure of the Office of ERI

The Office of Educational Research and Improvement will not encompass all activities relating to research, development, dissemination, demonstrations, evaluation, and policy analysis. It will, however, encompass a substantial proportion of these activities, particularly those that support the priorities of State, local, and private educational agencies and other organizations and individuals concerned with learning more about and improving the quality of American education.

Among the existing organizational units or functions that are specifically assigned or that might be included within the Office are:

All elements of science education programs transferred to the Department from the National Science Foundation. (Assigned.)

The National Institute of Education.

The Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education. (Assigned.)

The nonbroadcast telecommunications programs transferred by this bill from the Office of the Secretary of HEW to the Department. (Assigned.)

Those activities of NCES that involve longitudinal research or analysis on the condition and future of American education.

A capacity for policy-related research and evaluation studies assigned to the Office by the Congress or the Secretary.

Some existing demonstration and development programs aimed at supporting specific changes in curriculum or science-related programs, for example, metric or environmental education.

Telecommunications development activities currently scattered among numerous offices can be brought together in an effort to develop a more coherent Federal policy in this area.

Educational policy analysis studies and associated staff activities, which are also scattered among various offices and levels of the educational bureaucracy, can be brought together for the purpose of associating these tasks with the decisionmaking and planning processes.

The possibilities of improving the linkages and integration of numerous related, and sometimes overlapping program authorities are endless. The Committee expects the Secretary and Assistant Secretary to develop a more cohesive framework for the myriad number of research and improvement programs.

Locating the science education programs now in NSF alongside those science-related programs currently in the Office provides an example of the potential opportunities the Office for ERI provides.

The demonstration and faculty development programs in science education are consistent with and supportive of many of FIPSE's purposes. Science-related education programs currently administered by the Education Division equal in size those being transferred from the Science Education Directorate of the NSF. Improving linkages among this array of scientific programs will enrich the quality of Federal efforts to deal with the serious decline in student achievement in science and related fields.

Concluding comments

The Committee expects the Assistant Secretary for the ERI to support the policies and priorities specified in Sections 404, 405 and 406 of the General Education Provisions Act, which relate to the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education and the National Institute of Education. Equal commitments are required for continuing R.&D. policies and activities relating to the science education programs being transferred by the bill from NSF. Moreover, in developing the character, structure and practices of the Office and in allocating research and improvement functions throughout the Department, the Committee suggests the Secretary work closely with the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee and the House Education and Labor Committee.

HEW'S SPECIAL INSTITUTIONS

There are presently four educationally oriented institutions over which the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare maintains budgetary oversight, and for which the Federal government is the major source of revenue. Each of these "special institutions" have as their primary mission the education and assistance of special, handicapped, or disadvantaged constituencies.

The Committee believes the transfer of the current relationship between these Special Institutions and the Federal government to the Department of Education is a logical and wise move. The four institutions include:

> American Printing House for the Blind, located in Louisville, Ky., established by Congress to provide educational materials to elementary and secondary school-age blind students.
> National Technical Institute for the Deaf, located in Rochester, N.Y., provides residential, coeducational postsecondary technical education for the deaf.
> Gallaudet College, in Washington, an educational institution providing college preparatory, undergraduate and continuing education programs for the deaf. Gallaudet also includes the Model Secondary School for the Deaf and the Kendall Demonstration Elementary School.
> Howard University, in Washington, a private nonprofit undergraduate college, graduate school and medical facility emphasizing the training of minorities in technical and professional fields.

The total Federal contribution to these four Special Institutions totaled $178.7 million in fiscal year 1979. The Committee estimates that no more than one or two staff positions are needed for maintaining oversight over the schools.

The Committee is impressed with the successes of these institutions, and recommends their association with the Federal government continue. The missions of these four institutions will follow closely that of the Department of Education.

In the past, all four institutions agree HEW has allowed them maximum flexibility in determining their programs and content of curricula, and in experimenting with new, innovative ideas in their special educational missions. The Committee strongly believes such a high degree of independence and autonomy must continue in the Department of Education.

While the responsibility for oversight of these institutions is statutorily vested in the Office of the Secretary, the Committee suggests the Secretary should consider the possibility of coordinating the functions of Gallaudet College, National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and American Printing House for the Blind with those of the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services in the new Department. Oversight for Howard University should be coordinated with and linked to the Office of Postsecondary Education.

USDA GRADUATE SCHOOL

The Committee recommends the transfer of the USDA Graduate School to the new Department of Education.

The Graduate School was created in 1921 and has evolved over the years into a first-rate continuing education program benefiting nearly 30,000 employees of the Department of Agriculture, employees of other Federal agencies, and other citizens living in the Washington metropolitan area. The school receives no Federal appropriations, and its staff is not subject to civil service guidelines. The school does not exist for any purpose integrally related to the mission of the USDA. In fact, most of its students are employees of other Federal agencies, or are members of the general public. The Committee believes the central purpose and goal of the Graduate School relates closely to that of the Department of Education. The new Department will be very much concerned with adult and continuing education, which is the primary mission of the Graduate School. Further, the school will develop a more professional image by its association with an education agency, rather than an agricultural agency. The school's ties to USDA have been the source of much confusion over what it really does and what it accomplishes.

The Committee expects the Secretaries of Education and Agriculture to develop a plan and set of procedures, with concurrence of the Director and Board of Trustees of the school, for transferring the administrative offices to the Department of Education. Appropriate facilities should be made available which assure that the Graduate School continues and flourishes as a nonaccrediting and continuing educational institution.

The Graduate School should remain independent and not subject to any statutory or administrative responsibilities established by this Act. In no such manner should the Secretary of Education, or any other official of the Federal government, attempt to exercise any direct influence over the curriculum, program of instruction, administration, or personnel of the Graduate School. That should remain the primary responsibility of the school's board of trustees.

The Committee assumes that the Department and its education programs will require substantial library, classroom, demonstration and audiovisual facilities, and that these facilities can be shared and utilized by the participants, faculty and students of the Graduate School.

The Committee intends that the transfer of the Graduate School will not terminate or lessen educational services provided by the Graduate School to the Department of Agriculture and its employees. Nor should the change in administrative locations alter the special relationships which the Graduate School currently maintains with other Federal agencies, offices and private institutions throughout the Washington area.

Moreover, the Graduate School should continue to be maintained as an independent, nongovernmental institution and, other than indirect services accorded to its administrators and program operations, no federally appropriated funds should be used to support the ongoing operation of the Graduate School functions.

The Graduate School should also retain the prerogative to operate in its present format and under existing policies, or to sever its current physical ties with federal agencies and, thus, become a more independent, self-sufficient and autonomous educational institution. Such alterations of policies influencing or governing future directions of the Graduate School should be totally within the jurisdiction of its director, deputy director and board of trusteees. This transfer should not, in any way, affect the school's by-laws or rules and regulations.

The Committee believes the transfer of the Graduate School to the Department of Education will have a beneficial impact on both institutions. The Committee fully expects the Graduate School will continue to expand and prosper under the new Department.

CONSOLIDATION OF STUDENT AID PROGRAMS

S. 210 consolidates an additional four student loan programs in the Department of Education. This action builds on the work of the Administration towards consolidating most student assistance programs in a single agency to reduce fraud and increase efficiency. Last year, a giant step was taken towards this end through the creation of the Bureau of Student Financial Assistance in the U.S. Office of Education.

The maze of Federal student aid programs has hindered outreach, reduction of paperwork, and attempts to combat fraud. By not being together in one agency, these aid programs have developed different and incoherent funding mechanisms. Their outreach attempts have been very inconsistent—students know about some, but not others. Their eligibility standards are often not equitable or even comparable to similar aid programs. Perhaps worst of all, the scattering of student aid programs encourages substantial rates of default and abuse.

The legislation provides for the transfer of the Health Professions Student Loans programs from HEW, the Nursing Loans and Scholarships program from HEW, and the Law Enforcement Education Program loans from the Department of Justice. The combined budgets of these programs totals $66.7 million for Fiscal Year 1979.

The Committee believes there will be several benefits from this consolidation. It will lead to reduction of paperwork and simplification of application procedures. Administered in a single agency, the loan programs would probably require a simpler, uniform application which could be used for applying for most forms of Federal student assistance. The national student organizations believe this consolidation will also lead to better information distribution to college students and prospective students, not only on these loan programs, but also on their relationship to other forms of Federal student aid, such as grants and work study. High school students are particularly hard-hit by the fragmentation of Federal aid programs, primarily because there have been few coordinated efforts to inform them on a nationwide scale of their availability and existence. Both Congress and the Administration will find it easier to analyze the policy implications of the student aid programs, including such issues as student indebtedness and the effects of loans on career choices, when they are together in one agency.

Further, centralizing student loan programs would allow for the development of a standard need determination formula, so that aid can be better targeted to students who really need it most. And, consolidating the loan programs together has the potential for saving money, through shared administrative staff, and through improved Federal collection efforts, debt deferral, and forgiveness activities by reducing multiple billing agencies to one. The Office of Management and Budget estimates that at least $30 million could be saved by the consolidation.

The Committee finds that the Health Professions, Nursing, and Law Enforcement loans are, first and foremost, student assistance programs. As such, their purpose is related more to the mission of the Department of Education than their present parent agencies. The benefits which will be realized from the transfer are substantial, both in terms of cost savings and operating effectiveness.

MIGRANT EDUCATION

The committee recommends that the $6.5 million migrant education programs of the Department of Labor be transferred to the Department.

The two programs, High School Equivalency Program and the College Assistant Migrant Program, are funded under Title II of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act. Their principal objectives are to expand educational and employment opportunities for disadvantaged migrants of school age.

The Committee believes the transfer of these two programs to the department will facilitate the administration of a coordinated and better focused Federal effort to increase the level of education for migrants. The HEW Education Division already has significant programs for migrant education, including the special compensatory education program for children of migrant farmworkers until Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. Other programs such as Upward Bound and Talent Search are very similar in purpose to the College Assistance Migrant program.

In the past, coordination between the Department of Labor and HEW in the field of migrant education has been weak. The Committee believes the transfer will provide many opportunities to obtain needed research, evaluation, and curriculum development support for these migrant education programs—functions which the Labor Department is not in a position to provide.

COMMITTEE ACTION

The Committee on Governmental Affairs held three days of hearings on S. 210 in the 96th Congress—February 6–8, 1979. Altogether, 25 persons testified.

The committee held one mark-up session on March 14, and ordered the bill favorably reported by a vote of nine members present and five members by proxy—yea, and one member present—nay.

This action in the 96th Congress supplements 10 days of hearings on the concept in the 95th Congress, with testimony from more than 100 witnesses. The Committee held three mark-up sessions in 1978, and reported S. 991 favorably without objection.

In the mark-up session on S. 210 on March 14, 1979, the Committee adopted two amendments. The first, by Senator Roth, added language to Section 103 of the bill, "State and Local Responsibilities for Education," which further clarified the intent of the Committee to protect the rights and prerogatives of States, their local school systems, and other instrumentalities of the States, and public and nonpublic educational institutions in education policy and program decision-making in the establishment of the Department of Education. The second amendment, offered by Senator Danforth, also amended the language of Section 103 to clarify the intent of Congress in protecting local control of education.

ROLLCALL VOTE IN COMMITTEE

The committee's only rollcall vote on S. 210 was for final passage:[1]

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF S. 210

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 101. Statement of findings

Section 101 sets forth the findings of the Congress that (1) education is fundamental to the growth and achievement of the Nation; (2) there is a continual need to provide equal access to education for all Americans; (3) the primary responsibility for education has in the past, and must continue in the future, to reside with the States, the local school systems, and other instrumentalities of the States, and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions, communities, and families; (4) in our federal system, the primary public responsibility for education is reserved respectively to the States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, and tribal governments; (5) the dispersion of education programs across a large number of Federal agencies has led to fragmented, duplicative, and often inconsistent Federal policies relating to education; (6) there is a lack of coordination of Federal resources for State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions; (7) Presidential and public consideration of issues relating to education is hindered by the present organizational position of education programs in the executive branch of the Government; (8) the importance of education is increasing as new technologies and alternative approaches to traditional education are considered, as society becomes more complex, and as equal opportunities in education and employment are promoted; and (9) therefore, it is in the public interest and general welfare of the United States to establish a Department of Education.

Section 102. Purposes

Section 102 states the purposes of the Department are to (1) enable education to receive the appropriate emphasis at the Federal level; (2) continue and strengthen the Federal commitment to insuring access by every individual to equal educational opportunities; (3) supplement and complement the efforts of States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, parents, and students to improve the quality of education; (4) encourage the increased involvement of parents, students, and the community in the process relating to education, including the development and improvement of education programs and services; (5) enable the Federal Government to coordinate education activities and programs more effectively through interagency cooperation, technical assistance, and evaluation of program effectiveness; (6) (A) provide assistance in the support of basic and applied educational research; (B) collect and analyze information on the progress and condition of education in the United States; and (C) work with State, local, and tribal officials, public and nonpublic education institutions, community organizations, parents, and students to implement the findings of such research at the local level; and (7) supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, tribal, public, and nonpublic agencies by providing support to the articulated educational needs of such agencies, especially with respect to the simplification of the process, procedures, and administrative structures for the dispersal of Federal funds, as well as the reduction of unnecessary and duplicative burdens and constraints, including unnecessary paperwork, on the recipients of Federal funds.

Section 103(a) (1) states the establishment of the Department of Education shall not increase the authority of the Federal government over education or diminish the responsibility for education which is reserved to the States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States and tribal governments. During mark-up, the Committee expressed its intention to make clear that responsibility for control of education is reserved to the States and their instrumentalities and tribal governments. Thus, the establishment of the Department is not intended to infringe upon the local control of schools nor is it intended to increase the Federal government's authority over education.

Section 103(a)(2) states it is the intention of the Congress in the establishment of the Department of Education to protect the rights of State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions in the areas of educational policies and administration of programs, including but not limited to competency testing and selection of curricula and program content, and to strengthen and improve the control of such governments and institutions over their own educational programs and policies. The Department should also recognize the role these governmental bodies have to determine their own methods for raising revenues.

Section 103(b) states nothing in this Act shall be construed to require any particular organization at the State level of any programs transferred to the Department, including vocational rehabilitation programs. This subsection recognizes the diversity of state governance structures and shows the Committee's intent that no particular organizational structure is required at the State level because of the transfer of any particular programs to the Department.

Section 104. Definitions

This section defines terms used in the Act. Such terms include Department; Secretary; Under Secretary; Assistant Secretary; Director (Director of the Office for Civil Rights); Administrator (Administrator of the Office of Education for Overseas Dependents); Council (Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education); Committee (Federal Interagency Committee on Education); and function.

TITLE II—ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT

Section 201. Department of Education

Section 201 establishes as an executive department of the Government, the Department of Education.

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS

Section 202 states the Department shall be administered by a Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level I of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5312 of title 5, United States Code.

The section establishes and Under Secretary of Education who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall have responsibility for the conduct of intergovernmental relations by the Department, in addition to other duties.

The Under Secretary will be responsible for assuring that the Department carries out its functions in a manner which supplements and complements the education policies, programs, and procedures of the States, the local school systems and other instrumentalities of the States, and tribal governments. The Under Secretary will also assure that appropriate officials of the Department consult with the appropriate individuals responsible for making policy relating to education in the States and localities concerning differences over education policies, programs, and procedures and concerning the impact of the rules and regulations of the Department on these governances. The Committee's intention in assigning the Under Secretary the responsibility for intergovernmental relations is to assure an intergovernmental perspective in the Department's overall activities.

The Under Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary shall prescribe. During the absence or disability of the Secretary, or in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Secretary, the Under Secretary shall act as Secretary. The Under Secretary shall be compensated at the rate provided for level III of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5314, United States Code. The section states the Secretary shall designate the order in which other officials of the Department shall act for and perform and functions of the Secretary during the absence or disability of the Secretary and/or Under Secretary.

The section establishes principal officers of the Department: an Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services; for Elementary and Secondary Education; for Postsecondary Education; for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education; for Educational Research and Improvement; a Director of the Office for Civil Rights; one additional Assistant Secretary; a General Counsel and an Inspector General. Each of the Assistant Secretaries, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the General Counsel and the Inspector General shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, and the General Counsel shall report directly to the Secretary. Each Assistant Secretary, the Director of the Office for Civil Rights, the General Counsel, and the Inspector General shall be compensated at the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

The Assistant Secretary appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(1)(G) shall administer the functions of the Department under section 203(11). These functions are concerned with planning, evaluation and coordination administration of the Department and its programs. This Assistant Secretary shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

Subsection (e) provides for an Administrator of Education for Overseas Dependents. The Administrator shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. The Administrator shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

Subsection (f) provides for one additional officer who shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe. Such officer shall be compensated at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule contained in section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

The section states that whenever the President submits the name of an individual to the Senate for confirmation as an officer of the Department under subsections (c) or (d), the President shall state the particular functions of the Department such individual will exercise upon taking office. This provision is not meant to prohibit the Secretary from reassigning duties and functions or from changing such duties or functions of the officer at a later time if it is necessary to do so for the efficient operation or functioning of the Department.

Section 203. Functions of the Department

Section 203 outlines the functions of the Department. It states the function of the Department shall be to promote the cause and advancement of education throughout the United States and shall include—(1) administration of programs pertaining to elementary and secondary education; (2) administration of programs pertaining to postsecondary education; (3) administration of programs pertaining to occupational, adult, and community education; (4) administration of education grants and other programs for which the Department has responsibility under law; (5) administration of programs relating to special education and rehabilitative services; (6) enforcement of the civil rights laws relating to education; (7) intergovernmental policies and relations, including responsibility for assuring Federal education policies and procedures supplement and complement the efforts of State, local, and tribal governments, the private sector, public and nonpublic educational institutions, public or private nonprofit educational research institutions, community-based organizations, and parents to improve their educational programs; (8) administration of schools for the overseas dependents of personnel of the Department of Defense; (9) research, dissemination of improved educational practices and the coordinated collection and dissemination of statistics; (10) public information; (11) planning and evaluation of the programs of the Department, and development of policies to promote the efficient and coordinated administration of the Department and the programs of the Department and to encourage improvement in education; (12) congressional relations, including responsibility for providing a continuing liaison between the Department and the Congress; (13) administration and management of the Department, including responsibility for legal assistance, accounting, personnel, payroll, budgeting, and other administrative functions; and (14) monitoring parental and public participation in programs where such participation is required by law, and encouraging the involvement of parents, students, and the public in the development and implementation of departmental programs.

Section 204. Office for Civil Rights

Section 204 establishes an Office for Civil Rights to be administered by a Director. In light of the importance the Committee attributes to civil rights enforcement in education, the bill provided in section 202 that the Director shall be an executive level IV, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, who reports directly to the Secretary. Presently, the Director of Civil Rights is at the level of GS-18. The Secretary shall delegate to the Director all functions of the Office for Civil Rights of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to education transferred to the Secretary (other than administrative and support functions). The Director shall perform such additional duties and exercise such additional powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

The Office for Civil Rights (OCR) shall be the agency within the Department with the authority to exercise sanctions against recipients found violating non-discrimination provisions, and which are funded by any agency of the Department. This responsibility, however, does not diminish the Secretary's responsibility as the chief policy official of the Department, who must be responsible for civil rights compliance and enforcement.

Section 204 provides that the Secretary shall delegate all civil rights compliance and enforcement functions (other than administrative and support functions) to the Office for Civil Rights. This provision was included to make certain that civil rights enforcement responsibilities are not delegated by the Secretary to any official in the Department other than the OCR Director. An adequately staffed Office for Civil Rights, with complete authority from the Secretary, can ensure that all civil rights laws are enforced in all program units of the new Department.

This prohibition against the Secretary delegating authority to enforce civil rights laws to offices other than the OCR is not intended to limit the Secretary's ability to utilize staff who work in other offices both inside or outside the Department for other functions such as pre-award audits or postgrant monitoring. Clearly, such staff might provide specific expertise necessary to help carry out or lend support to civil rights enforcement activities. However, under section 204(a), such staff must be responsible to the OCR Director for those portions of the Secretary's responsibilities for employing sanctions for noncompliance which they exercise.

Section 204(b) requires the Director for Civil Rights each year to prepare and transmit a report to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress concerning the status of compliance with civil rights laws relating to education. In addition to this status report, the report shall incdude a statement concerning the OCR's plans and recommendations to ensure improved enforcement of and continued compliance with civil rights laws related to education. The Committee anticipates that this report will identify significant problems of compliance or enforcement which may require oversight by appropriate congressional committees and a description of the specific enforcement activities indicated by OCR during the previous year.

The annual report shall be submitted directly by the Director to the President, the Secretary, and the Congress without clearance or approval by any executive branch official. The Committee views this report as a mechanism to obtain a precise, objective statement of the status of existing and future plans for civil rights enforcement in education. The Director should, however, insofar as feasible, provide a copy of the report to the Secretary sufficiently in advance of its submission to the President and to Congress to provide a reasonable opportunity for the Secretary's comments to be appended to it when transmitted to Congress and the President by the Director.

Section 205. Office of Elementary and Secondary Education

Section 205 establishes in the Department an Office of Elementary and Secondary Education, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education. In addition, the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education shall perform such other duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 206. Office of Postsecondary Education

Section 206 establishes in the Department an Office of Postsecondary Education. The Office shall be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education. The Office would assure that the needs and concerns of postsecondary institutions are represented and supported. The Office will develop and coordinate policies and programs designed to improve postsecondary educational opportunities.

The Assistant Secretary for Postsecondary Education shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 207. Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education

Section 207 establishes an Office of Occupational, Adult, and Community Education, to be administered by an Assistant Secretary for Occupational, Adult, and Community Education. This Office will be responsible for administering those programs relating to manpower training and development, technical training, and other functions concerned with vocational, occupational, adult, and continuing education. Because of the creation of this new office, the Committee expects the functions and duties previously performed by the Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education to be performed by the new Office.

The Assistant Secretary shall perform such additional duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 208. Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services

This Office will contain the programs administered under the Education of the Handicapped Act, including the programs previously administered by the Bureau for the Education and Training of the Handicapped. In addition, the Office will contain the programs administered by the Rehabilitation Services Administration (RSA), with the exception of vocational rehabilitation services for Social Security disability beneficiaries and vocational rehabilitation services for Supplemental Security Income beneficiaries, or the Developmental Disability programs. The Office will have responsibility for administering the Randolph-Sheppard Act. It will also have transferred to it the functions of the Commissioner of Rehabilitation, the functions of the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research of HEW, and the functions of the Office of Information and Resources for the Handicapped. The Assistant Secretary shall also perform additional duties prescribed by the Secretary.

It is the intention of the Committee to create a comprehensive office of consolidated programs for the education of the handicapped. The Committee believes this will initiate the development of an effective policy for the education of the handicapped that will aid handicapped individuals from birth through adulthood.

The creation of this Office will provide the Assistant Secretary an opportunity to efficiently coordinate the programs which were administered by RSA with those which were administered by the Bureau for the Education and Training of the Handicapped.

It is the Committee's expectation that the Assistant Secretary will be a strong advocate for the furtherance of the goal of increasing the ability of handicapped individuals to adapt to society.

Although the Committee strongly believes vocational rehabilitation programs are educationally focused and should be included within the Department of Education at the Federal level, it is not the intention (as stated explicitly in section 103) to change any existing organizational structural requirements for vocational rehabilitation programs at the State level; thus the enactment of this section does not specifically mandate any particular organizational structure of the programs at the State level with respect to the transfer.

Section 209. Office of Education for Overseas Dependents

This section establishes an Office of Education for Overseas Dependent Children, to be administered by the Administrator for Education for Overseas Dependent Children.

The Administrator would carry out the functions transferred to the Secretary from the Department of Defense relating to the Office of Dependents Schools of the Department of Defense and to the operation of schools for dependent children of members of the Armed Forces (other than administrative and support functions).

The Committee expects the Secretary will make available to the Office and the Administrator other resources in the Department for the improvement of the Dependents Schools, including educational research functions, vocational education programs, education of the handicapped services, and other programs for the improvement of academic facilities and personnel.

Section 210. Office of Educational Research and Improvement

Section 210 establishes an Office of Educational Research and Improvement, to be administered by the Assistant Secretary for Research and Improvement. The section states that the Secretary shall delegate to this Assistant Secretary all functions relating to the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education, those functions transferred which relate to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations; and the science education functions transferred intact from the National Science Foundation cited by section 303.

In establishing this Office, the Committee recognizes the important role of the Federal Government in assisting research and development activities which are designed to improve education, public understanding, and the capacities of educational institutions. This Office will integrate and coordinate the wide range of research, development, and demonstration programs.

The programs proposed for inclusion in the new Office are included because their overall missions fit into and would complement the new Office. Although this section does not specifically place the National Institute of Education into this Office, the Committee feels this placement in appropriate. It recommends that the authorizing committees, in conjunction with reauthorizing legislation for the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education and the National Institute of Education, consider the renewal for these programs within an organization and decision-making framework which will ultimately enhance the research and improvement role for the Department.

Additionally, the Assistant Secretary shall perform such other duties as the Secretary may prescribe.

Section 211. Office of General Counsel

This section establishes an Office of General Counsel, to be administered by the General Counsel.

The General Counsel shall perform necessary duties with respect to legal assistance to the Secretary concerning the programs and policies of the Department and any other additional duties the Secretary feels are appropriate for this Office.

Section 212. Office of Inspector General

Section 212 establishes in the Department an Office of Inspector General. The Inspector General will be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Inspector General Act of 1978, which is amended by section 212 to add the Inspector General of the Department of Education.

The Inspector General shall carry out the functions of the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to education transferred to the Department or the Secretary.

It is the Committee's intent that the Inspector General function be a strong component in the new Department. Since this Department will spend more than $14 billion in Federal moneys, it is the Committee's view that the Inspector General's office actively and thoroughly investigate any abuses or mismanagement of funds.

Section 213. Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education

Section 213 establishes within the Department an Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education. The purpose of the Council is to provide assistance and make recommendations to the Secretary and the President concerning intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education.

The functions of the Council are to provide a forum for the development of intergovernmental policies and relations relating to education; make recommendations for the improvement of the administration and operation of Federal education programs and education-related programs; promote better intergovernmental relations; assess Federal policies and make recommendations to ensure effective direction over educational policymaking and program implementation by State, local, and tribal governments and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

The Council is also required to submit a report every 2 years to Congress, the President, and the Secretary which reviews the impact of Federal education policies upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions, and assesses the achievement of Federal objectives in education as well as any adverse consequences of Federal actions upon State, local, and tribal governments, and public and nonpublic educational institutions.

The Council would assist the Secretary in conducting conferences and similar activities to assess the contributions of each level of government to the delivery of equitable, high-quality, and effective education.

If the Council wishes, it may review existing and proposed rules or regulations of the Department in order to determine their impact or potential impact on State, local and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions. The Committee has specifically left this power discretionary in order to allow the Council to concentrate its efforts in this area on those rules and regulations which it determines to have a significant impact on intergovernmental relations.

Whenever the Council reviews rules or regulations of the Department, it may submit to the Secretary a report containing the results of its review and recommending changes to make the rules or regulations more responsive to the needs and concerns of State, local and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions. The Secretary must respond in writing to such a report within 30 days of its receipt. If the Council's report concerns proposed rules or regulations, it must be submitted to Secretary within the time period and according to the procedures of the Department governing public comment on such rules or regulations. Moreover, in the case of proposed rules or regulations, the Council's report and the Secretary's written response must be placed on the record of the proceeding.

In giving the Council the power to review rules or regulations of the Department and requiring the Secretary to respond in writing to its recommendations, the Committee's intention is to ensure a continuing dialogue between the Council and the Secretary on the effects of the Department's rules and regulations on State, local and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions. However, the Committee wants to emphasize that the Department should not limit its consideration of intergovernmental relations in the rulemaking process to after-the-fact comments by the Council on rules or regulations that have already been drafted. The Department should seek to bring an intergovernmental perspective to the rulemaking process from beginning to end by consulting frequently both with the Council and with other officials and groups representing State, local and tribal governments, public and nonpublic educational institutions. Section 202. (b)(1) of S. 210 makes it the specific responsibility of the Undersecretary to bring this perspective to the Department's rulemaking process.

The Council's membership shall be composed of twenty-five members. One of its members shall be the Under Secretary of Education. The President shall appoint eight members from among State Governors, legislators, boards of education (both elementary and secondary and postsecondary), and chief education officials (both elementary and secondary and postsecondary); eight members from among local or regional elected general government officials, local boards of education, public and nonpublic school administrators, and tribal governments; two members from among institutions; and six members from among the public, including parents, teachers, students, and public interest groups.

In making appointments to the Council, the President shall consult with a broad cross-section of organizations representative of the groups to be chosen to the Council. These groups include but are not limited to representatives of State and local governmental authorities, school boards and school officials, and education organizations. Such groups to be consulted with might include the National Governor's Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, the United States Conference of Mayors, and the National School Boards Association. This consultation is not limited, however, to the organizations specified. It is the Committee's view that the President should also consult with other groups which are representative of the membership selected to the Council. Such organizations would include educational organizations, citizens' public interest groups, including civil rights groups, tribal organizations and student groups. The committee feels this consultation is important in order to ensure the type of broad-based and geographically balanced representation on the Council which is necessary to carry out its stated objectives in bringing the opinions and ideas of those persons involved in the educational process to the attention of the Department.

Not more than thirteen of the members of the Council may be members of the same political party.

Members of the Council would be appointed for a four-year term.

Any member of the Council may serve on the Council beyond the period that the member holds the elective office which served as the basis of his or her appointment.

The Council shall elect one of its members as Chair of the Council.

Any vacancy in the Council shall not affect its power to function.

The section prescribes that the per diem paid to the Council members will be the equivalent of the daily rate for a GS-18.

The Council is authorized to hold hearings and request the attendance and testimony of witnesses, as well as the cooperation and assistance of other Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities.

The Council would have the authority to nominate an executive director for the Council, who would be appointed by the Secretary. The executive director would be compensated at the rate provided for a GS-17. The Secretary should seek the approval of the Council in making the choice of the executive director. In addition, the Secretary is required to provide the Council with additional staff, facilities, and assistance as needed to carry out the Council's activities.

Section 214. Federal Interagency Committee on Education

This section establishes the Federal Interagency Committee on Education to conduct studies and make recommendations in order to assure the effective coordination of Federal programs affecting education.

The committee would be composed of at least 17 members. In order to provide more opportunity for greater coordination, the Secretary could expand this number to include other agencies involved in other education-related programs. One member would be the Secretary, who would be the chairman of the committee. Sixteen members would be representatives of the following departments and agencies: Department of Agriculture, Department of Commerce, Department of Defense, Department of Energy, Department of Justice, Department of Health and Welfare, Department of the Interior, Department of Labor, Department of State, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, National Endowment for the Arts, National Endowment for the Humanities, National Science Foundation, Veterans Administration, Commission on Civil Rights, and Environmental Protection Agency.

The committee believes the coordination of Federal education programs outside the Department with those inside will be a critically important function of the Department and the Secretary. One of the basic reasons for the creation of the Department of Education is to improve coordination of education at the Federal level.

FICE should become a viable, active tool of the Secretary in eliminating duplication of effort between the Department and other Federal agencies. The committee fully expects the Secretary will take an active role in the operation and work of FICE. That is the purpose of naming the Secretary of Education as the chairperson. FICE should be an important mechanism for the conduct of comprehensive studies on the Federal role in education, and where the effort can be streamlined.

The committee further expects the agencies designated to be represented on FICE in the legislation will also take active roles in improving coordination and performance of their education programs. The committee has specifically required these agencies to appoint senior officials involved in policymaking functions to represent them on FICE. FICE will be effective only as long as it has as members individuals who hold significant policy and decisionmaking authority.

Although the bill requires FICE to meet at least twice each year, the committee expects the Secretary will utilize FICE more often, especially in the first 3 years of the life of the new Department, when relationships among the many Federal agencies involved in education are developing and becoming formalized.

This section also mandates FICE to conduct a study concerning the need for improved coordination between all federally funded vocational education and training programs. FICE is required to report its findings to Congress within 2 years. The Committee intends that FICE devote much attention to and conduct an extensive investigation of the relationship between vocational education programs in the Department with other vocational-oriented programs in the Department of Labor. The Committee has been made aware of lack of coordination and duplication of effort between the vocational education and training programs of HEW and the Department of Labor. A strong, coordinated vocational education and training effort is important to the economic growth of the nation.

TITLE III—TRANSFERS OF AGENCIES AND FUNCTIONS

Section 301. Transfers from HEW

Section 301(a) transfers all officers, employees, assets, liabilities, contracts, grants, property, and records as are determined by the Office of Management and Budget Director are to be employed, held, or used primarily in connection with any function of the following agencies, offices, or parts of agencies or offices:

(x) the Education of the Handicapped Act;

(xii) the Vocational Education Act of 1963;
(xiii) the Career Education Incentive Act; and (xiv) section 400A of the General Education Provisions Act, relating to the Federal Education Data Acquisition Council.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(B) transfers part B of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(C) transfers the functions administered by the Secretary or the Office for Civil Rights for the enforcement of civil rights laws and educational orders relating to the functions transferred elsewhere in the bill.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(D) transfers all laws dealing with the relationship between Gallaudet College (including the Model Secondary School for the Deaf), Howard University, the American Printing House for the Blind, and the National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and the Department of HEW.

Through the transfer of these Special Institutions, the Committee intends that the new Department continue to allow these institutions maximum flexibiliy, independence, and autonomy in determining their educational program and system. The Secretary should consider coordinating the oversight of Gallaudet College, National Technical Institute for the Deaf, and American Printing House for the Blind with the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. Coordination of oversight of Howard University would be best linked with the Office of Postsecondary Education.

Subsection 301(b)(2)(E) transfers functions under subpart A of part IV of title III of the Communications Act of 1934, relating to Federal grants for telecommunications demonstrations;

Subsection 301(b)(2)(F) transfers functions under subparts II and III of part B of title VIII of the Public Health Service Act, relating to the establishment of student loan funds and scholarship grant programs for schools of nursing and under subparts I and II of part C of title VII of such Act, relating to the establishment of student loan insurance and student loan funds for schools of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, pharmacy, podiatry, optometry, or veterinary medicine.

The Committee intends that these student loans be administered together with other student assistance programs (e.g., BEOG program, National Direct Student Loans, work study) in a single agency within the Department. Strong efforts should be made to reduce and simplify paperwork and other requirements, develop uniform need determination policies, and improve audit and collection systems to reduce defaults and fraud.

Subsection 301(b)(3)(G) transfers the functions being administered under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, except that the provisions of this subdivision are not intended to transfer vocational rehabilitation services for social security disability beneficiaries, vocational rehabilitation services for supplemental security income beneficiaries, or the developmental disabilities programs. This subsection also transfers the Randolph-Sheppard vending facility program, which is administered by the Commissioner but is not authorized by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

Subsection 301(b)(4) transfers to the Secretary all functions of the Commissioner of the Rehabilitation Services Administration of HEW, and the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research of HEW under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

Subsection 301(b)(5) transfers the functions of the National Institute of Education.

Subsection 301(b)(6) transfers the functions of the Institute of Museum Services.

Subsection 301(b)(7) states nothing in the provisions of this section or in the provisions of this Act shall authorize the transfer of functions under part A of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, relating to Project Head Start, from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to the Secretary.

In describing the functions of the Department of Education, the Committee has attempted to provide a complete list of existing functions now located in HEW that would appropriately be transferred to the Department. The subsection is not intended as a broad authority permitting transfer, by administrative determination, of additional functions up to now clearly associated with health or welfare programs of the Department.

In addition, it is the Committee's intent that prior experience requirements for employees performing specified functions be maintained as Congress intended. Examples are requirements in section 160(b) of the Vocational Education Act of 1963 (20 U.S.C. 2390(b)) that certain individuals performing vocational education functions have prior experience in the fields of junior and community college education, occupational guidance and counseling, and engineering.

Section 302. Transfers of agencies and functions from the Department of Defense

This section provides for the transfer of the Department of Defense overseas dependents schools. This section also authorizes the operation of the dependents schools, which in the past have been authorized only by appropriation legislation, but after July 1, 1979, will be authorized by the Defense Dependents Education Act of 1978, Title XIV of the Education Amendments of 1978. The Secretary is required to develop a comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer of the schools within 1 year of the date of enactment.

The Committee recognizes the operation of the dependents schools will require careful analysis before a plan of transfer can be designed and executed. During this transition, the Congress expects the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Education to work closely to assure a smooth transfer of the schools and to avoid and disruption to the education programs conducted in the schools. In addition, section 505(a) of the bill requires that agreements between the schools and the Armed Forces in existence at the time the Department of Education is established shall remain in effect until new agreements are negotiated as part of the planned transfer of the schools.

The administrative reorganization of the schools which is currently underway should continue, and should not be disrupted during the transitional period.

The section requires that the comprehensive plan for transfer include recommendations for increasing the participation of parents, educators, students, school administrators, and military personnel in the operation and development of the schools. The Committee believes it is important to consider the need for the creation of a board or commission, made up of the aforementioned individuals, to guarantee more input in the development of policy and in the operation of the schools by those involved with the educational process. Such a board would operate at the Federal level, and could have responsibilities similar to that of a State board of education. The Committee expects the Secretary will transmit to Congress his or her recommendations, developed after much study and consultation with all affected parties, for the structure and authority of such a board. These recommendations should be contained with the comprehensive plan for effecting the transfer of the schools.

Section 303. Transfers of functions from the National Science Foundation

Subsection (a) transfers certain programs of the National Science Foundation (NSF) or of the Director of the National Science Foundation relating to science education.

It does not transfer programs with respect to graduate fellowships and traineeships, including those encouraging minorities and women to enter scientific and technical careers, integral to the support of scientific research and development; programs concerned with ethical, value, and science policy issues; or those for communicating science information by scientists to nonscientists. Subsection (a) states no mission-oriented research functions or programs of the National Science Foundation nor of any other Federal agency shall be transferred by this Act, except as provided for specifically in the Act.

Subsection (b) authorizes the Secretary to conduct the programs transferred by subsection (a). Only certain existing National Science Foundation science education programs are being transferred; NSF will retain the function and the right to continue its activity in appropriate science education programs. The Secretary is mandated to consult with the Director of NSF, as appropriate, when conducting the programs transferred under this section.

Subsection (c), which is related to subsection (b), assures that NSF retains the authority to institute new programs under section 3(a)(1) of the National Science Foundation Act of 1950, even though certain of its existing programs are being transferred to the new Department.

Section 304. Transfers of programs from the Department of Justice

This section transfers the student loan and grant programs known as the Law Enforcement and Education Program and the Law Enforcement Intern Program from the Department of Justice.

As with those programs transferred under section 301(b)(2)(F), the Committee intends that all student assistance programs be administered in a single agency within the Department. Strong efforts should be made to simplify Federal requirements, develop uniform need requirements, and improve audit and collection systems to reduce defaults and fraud in these programs as well.

Section 305. Transfers of functions from the Department of Housing and Urban Development

This section transfers the administration of college housing loans from the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Through the transfer, the Committee expects that the present high level of efficiency will be maintained in the administration of the program. The complex legal agreements and procedures used by HUD for the program should not be disrupted by the transfer. The Committee intends that the transfer will not change the existing relationships between HUD and the Federal Reserve Bank, which serves as the fiscal agent for the program. Further, the Committee recommends the Secretary coordinate and administer together the college housing program and the higher education facilities loan and insurance fund in the new Department to facilitate the development of a consolidated assistance program for construction of higher education facilities.

Section 306. Transfers of functions from the Department of Labor

This section transfers all functions of the Secretary of Labor or the Department of Labor under section 303(c)(2) of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act. These programs are the High School Equivalency Program and the College Assistance Migrant Program.

Section 307. Transfer of the Advisory Council on Education Statistics

This section transfers personnel, assets, and functions of the Advisory Council on Education Statistics.

Section 308. Effects of transfers

Any function of an officer or agency transferred will include any aspect vested in a subordinate of the officer or in a component of the agency.

TITLE IV: ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS—PART A: PERSONNEL PROVISIONS

Section 401. Officers and employees

Section 401 authorizes the Secretary to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, including attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Secretary and the Department. Except as otherwise provided by law, such officers and employees shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and compensated in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title.

Subsection (b)(1) states subject to the provisions of chapter 51 of title 5, United States Code, but notwithstanding the last two sentences of section 5108(a) of such title, the Secretary may place in grades GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18 all positions in such grades assigned and employed on February 1, 1979, in connection with functions transferred under this Act. This is subject to the limitation of the first sentence of section 5108(a) of such title, which places a limit on the maximum number of positions which may at one time be placed in GS-16, 17 and 18 positions and the Senior Executive Service.

Subsection (b)(2) states appointments under this subsection may be made without regard to the provisions of section 3324 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the approval by the Office of Personnel Management of appointments in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18. This provision applies if the individual placed in the position is transferred to the Department in connection with a transfer of functions under this Act and, immediately before the effective date of this Act, held a position involving duties comparable to those of such position.
